CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. VEST] regrets as much as the Senator does his absence, but he is absent simply because he is confined in bed by sickness.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very sorry to hear this, and I certainly sympathize with him as much as any one, as I have for him great respect; but in dealing with this question I must reply, or at least attempt to do so, in my feeble way, to some of the objections that have been made by these two Senators, and first to the objections made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The two leading propositions that seem to me to be in his mind, although clothed in such a manner that they did not stand out very boldly, except in one instance, are these: First, that Congress alone has the right to bring in new States; that is to say, if I understand him aright, that Congress after the organization of a Territory shall take the initiative in the preparation for its admission into the Union as a State; that is to say, that no State can properly be admitted unless an enabling act has first been passed by Congress. That, if I do not misunderstand him, is his position. In answer to that, I call attention to the fact that in the admission of twenty-five new States into this Union fourteen have been admitted under enabling acts of Congress and eleven States have been admitted without enabling acts of Congress. Hence there are two lines of precedents laid down for the admission of States by Congress, and these precedents have been followed so often that either one may be adopted by Congress and be perfectly correct. These precedents, sir, have become recognized in fact as law, and not in conflict one with the other, as circumstances indicate the rule of action by Congress. There being no rule laid down by the Constitution of the United States except that Congress may admit new States, rules have been laid down by Congress, varying as circumstances arose surrounding each case as it presented itself.

My friend from South Carolina, if he were here, perhaps at this point would differ with me—in fact I know he would—in reference to the manner of the admission of some of these States. There were in the cases of Vermont, Kentucky, Michigan, Arkansas, Florida, Iowa, California, Tennessee, Maine, and Oregon no enabling acts of Congress, and it will not do for the Senator from South Carolina to say because certain rights were claimed under certain cessions or grants that therefore they, the people of certain Territories, were organized into States properly without an enabling act, but in this case it would be unlawful. That, sir, is dodging the question. It makes no difference what Territory the State was carved out of, no difference what treaties may have existed, and none have existed having more binding force than those which are applicable to the Territory that now asks admission as a State; none whatever more applicable than that connected with Louisiana, a part of which was this Territory, and the ordinance of 1787 also extended to and over this Territory.

But laying this all aside, I care naught about it, you can not shift the question by saying there was a difference in the condition. The fact remains the same, as the States I have mentioned were admitted without an enabling act of Congress, were admitted with the present conditions for a State and in a great majority of instances not nearly so ample as in the case of Dakota. Congress assented without reference to any enabling act, only requiring the fact to be established that they had the population, had sufficient area, the productive capacity, and all that was essential, according to the views of Congress at the time, to make them a State in this Union.

Then, sir, if that be true, why is it that Dakota shall be required to enter the Union on a different basis from the eleven States which I have mentioned? Why is it that when Dakota is ready, with a population not transitory, with the productive capacity, the wealth, the intelligence, and being friendly disposed toward the Government, and with a desire to become a part of the family of States by being recognized as a State, we stick in the bark, technicalities and shadows instead of substance appear in the way in order to prevent that justice from being done these people which has always been meted out to others?

When I listened to the speech of my friend from the State of Missouri, without meaning any disrespect to him personally or his argument, I was reminded somewhat of a young lawyer who on first entering court was attempting to argue a special demurrer and insisting before the court that it went to the substance and materiality of the declaration. There never were so many merely technical and flimsy objections by men called statesmen, in my judgment, presented on the floor of the Senate against the rights of any people.

At this point it may be well to examine for one moment and see if we can what objection can be fairly made to the admission of Dakota as a State.

First I would ask the Senator from South Carolina, were he present, whether or not he objects to the size of this great Territory. As has been stated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] in his admirable presentation of this case both by report and in argument, this division of Dakota Territory that now asks admission into the Union as a State has in area 77,000 square miles. I can only repeat what has been said by him when I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if Dakota is admitted according to the lines laid down by the division made or asked to be made by Congress admitting them into the Union, they then would be the eighth State in this Union in number of square miles.

It has twice the area of Indiana, and is 20,000 square miles larger than the State of Illinois; 23,000 square miles larger than Arkansas; 8,000 square miles larger than Missouri; more than two and a half times as large as South Carolina; and from this State, not nearly half so large Dakota finds her greatest and strongest opposition—a State whose statesmen have led on the line upon which they moved, whether correct or incorrect, always in the advance; perhaps right sometimes, but wrong more times than right, and who now lead their political friends in opposition to this immense and grand Territory being admitted as a State into this Union.

Dakota is 10,000 square miles larger than all the six New England States together. One of the States of this Union has presented to the nation men regarded as statesmen, and to-day has given one of her citizens to this Government to manage the affairs of State. In area this Territory is more than thirty times as large as that State. Will the representatives from this State object? Surely, surely, Mr. President, the State of Delaware will not object to her big sister. Certainly there then can be no objection for want of length and breadth in the size of Dakota.

What next can be the objection? Can it be on account of its population, with over a quarter of a million of people, with a greater population to-day than any State (with the exception of three) had when admitted as new States into the Union? Then I take it for granted the objection can not go to the population.

Well, can it go to the character of the population? They are an energetic people; they are hardy pioneers; they are an intelligent people; they cultivate the soil; they have builded churches; are a civilized and Christianized people. Your objection, then, certainly can not go to the character of her population.

To what, then, does objection lie? One of the Senators said that the population was not distributed over the Territory sufficiently, and therefore he wants to divide it north and south because east of the Missouri River is the greater portion of the population. I desire to call that Senator's attention to the fact in connection with his own State that when it was admitted into the Union the population was not distributed more equally than the population of Dakota is. North Missouri was a vast wild country with widely scattered population. Take the State of Iowa when admitted into the Union; its population was not diffused or distributed throughout the Territory. Take the population of the State of Illinois. Within my recollection, from Springfield, near the center of the State, to the northern line was included in one Congressional district. In 1832 the Indians occupied the northern portion of Illinois, and Fort Dearborn at Chicago was the only protection there was in that portion of it from the Indians. The southern part of Illinois was the only populous part of the State when it was admitted into the Union. The northern portion that now bears the great mass of the population of that State, which now sends you a great majority of the Representatives from the State, was a waste, an open, wide expanse of prairie roamed over by Indians and uninhabited by white people.

So then the objection made that the western portion of this Territory has not the population in number found in the eastern portion is an objection not made against those States heretofore admitted and is not well taken. Mr. President, I feel justified in saying that these objections are far-fetched and frivolous. They certainly are not made seriously, but are made for old women and weak-minded men to hang an excuse upon in justification of the action of their objecting representatives, and not because they are founded in reason.

The farm products of this Territory, as stated by my friend from Indiana, amounted to $17,000,000 in 1884; the number of schools, 1,534; school-houses, 1,340; amount expended for schools in 1885, $1,200,000. I will not say, by way of criticising the action of States, but merely by way of calling attention to the arguments made by Senators, that were I so inclined I could name a number of States now having their interests represented on this floor by able men that were in existence as States almost a half-century before they had the number of schools and school-houses that there are now found in the Territory of Dakota, and some of the States represented by Senators who are in opposition to this bill, within a very few years have not had the number of schools and school-houses or expended the amount of money for the education of the children of their States that has been expended in the Territory of Dakota for the education of the children of that Territory; and yet it is not to be admitted as a sister State in this Union! But surely, sir, not on this ground will it be excluded.

Well, sir, are there other reasons? It can not be objected that her constitution is not republican in form. I have read it carefully and I think it a better constitution than some of the States have which have been in the Union for many, many years.

To these objections answer has been fully made. But, sir, the real objection—what can it be? Ah, sir, that objection is surrounded and covered up in such a way that it does not fully make its appearance to the Senate; it lies underneath the surface, only occasionally raising its head so that it may be seen. Perhaps by reading a paragraph from the speech of the Senator from South Carolina we may get a glimpse at it; its shadow appears. Let us examine and see what it is; whether or not it is a ghost that appears and haunts the Senators from South Carolina and from Missouri. On page 899 of the RECORD containing the Senator's speech I find the following—the speech is not a very long one, but a very able one to be based on nothing [laughter]:

Is there a pressing political exigency lurking behind this movement which impels it forward with almost unseemly haste and zeal? Is there a purpose underlying the pressure for Statehood to forestall the orderly progress of events in Dakota Territory under a new national administration, which might change the political complexion of representatives sent to the National Legislature different from those now seeking admission from this so-called State? I can not divest my mind of such a suspicion, and that a "snap" judgment would be rendered if we ratify this effort to make a State.

If I can understand the meaning of the Senator from South Carolina, and I think the language is plain enough to be understood, he means that he is opposed to the admission of Dakota for the reason that if it comes in now it will have representatives in the Congress of the United States of a different political complexion from the Administration. Is not that it?

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I should like to know.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator had read the speech he would not have found that question necessary, for I said distinctly that if the Territory were as largely Democratic as it appears now to be Republican I should oppose it as earnestly as I do this proposition, coming as it does. So the Senator has not done me the honor to read the whole of my remarks.

Mr. LOGAN. I have read the whole of the speech.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the explanation.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that in the commencement of your speech that is true, but why does this crop out in the conclusion, or near the conclusion of it?

I can not divest my mind of such a suspicion, and that a "snap" judgment would be rendered if we ratify this effort to make a State.

The Senator says he does not mean that.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say any such thing. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do mean exactly what I said.

Mr. LOGAN. You said that?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly I did, but the Senator gives that as the ground on which I was resisting the application of South Dakota for admission.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very much mistaken. He was not in when I commenced replying to him. I say that there are two grounds; first, the want of an enabling act, and I tried to answer that in the Senator's absence; and, second, I called attention to this as an objection. Is it not an objection?

Mr. BUTLER. It is a very serious objection; that is to say, it is an objection in the present form of the application for admission. If I was satisfied that that was the honest expression of the people of Dakota, if it was Republican I should not object in the slightest degree, but I do not believe that it is the honest expression.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, sir, I am not so far wrong after all. That is one objection, he says, in the present condition of things, or in other words, the manner in which it comes knocking at the door. If it was to come in a different form from what it does, then this objection would not arise. That is about it, is it not?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that I understand the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN: If I understood the response of the Senator it was this, that this is an objection in his mind now, inasmuch as Dakota comes to the door of Congress as she does. That is it?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; then I say if Dakota came in a different garb, it would not be an objection.

Mr. BUTLER. If Dakota came under an enabling act authorized by Congress, and I was perfectly satisfied that she had all the essential conditions necessary to Statehood, I should not object to it because she was Republican. I repeated that over and over again. But if the Senator will permit me, if she came here and I had any suspicion that even then it did not express the wishes and purposes of the people of that Territory, I should oppose it, not at all because she was Republican, but because I believed, as I stated in my remarks which the Senator has quoted from, that if we do it now, we shall render a snap judgment upon proceedings which appear to my mind to be controlled and influenced by a political clique.

Mr. LOGAN. "Controlled by a political clique!" That is very easily said. I believe if you will examine the speeches of nearly all of the Senators and Representatives who have opposed the admission of States heretofore you will find that similar expressions were used. It is very easy in a county where some people have things not exactly as they want them to get up in their own imagination what they call a town clique. So it is in a State. There is always a clique. If a person is dissatisfied he imagines he sees or understands that there is a clique. There is always a clique. If it is a Republican Territory that wants to come into the Union, there is always a clique that is forcing it in.

Now, Mr. President, I feel differently. I believe when a people having sufficient population and all the necessary requisites, believing in this Government, want to be admitted as a State, statesmanship should rise to that height that it would not inquire as to cliques or politics, Democratic or Republican. The man who stands in the doorway preventing a State from entering this Union because the people are Republicans is a partisan, too much so to make a great statesman, and the man who would do the same thing against a Territory because it is Democratic is equally wanting in statesmanship, and in my judgment will never rise, in the estimation of those whose good opinion he would desire, to the elevation he has fixed for himself.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. LOGAN. Then there is no dispute on that point.

Mr. BUTLER. Not a particle.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if we do not dispute on that point, the Senator says that if this was fair he would agree to it. Fair how? In the Territory of Dakota where they have in round numbers 263,000 people in this part of Dakota that desires to be admitted as a State, they voted about 55,000 at an election a short time ago, while South Carolina at the same time or about the same time, with a population of about 700,000, voted 91,000 votes.

Mr. BUTLER. Seven hundred thousand!

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. Well, how many have you?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken. We have in round numbers a million of population by the last census.

Mr. LOGAN. That increases it. I am glad it is a million. My mind was directed to another State at the time. South Carolina has a million of population, and Dakota Territory has 263,000. At the same time that the million of population of South Carolina voted about 91,000 votes, the 263,000 people of Dakota voted about 55,000 votes. Now, there is something wrong somewhere. How is that? It is said that they voted on this constitution about 31,000, and the thing cropped out here the other day that the reason why they did not cast as many votes as they had for Representative in 1884 was that the Democrats did not vote. The Democratic committee recommended them not to vote, and therefore they did not vote. Why? They perhaps had instructions not to vote so that these objections might be made to the admission of Dakota as a State.

Now, sir, when you tell the people of this country that you want votes sufficient to show that the proceeding was fair, with 263,000 population voting 55,000 formerly, and with your Democrats declining to vote voting about 31,000, you had better explain why it is that South Carolina the same year, with a million of population, voted only about 91,000 all told.

Mr. BUTLER. What has that to do with it?

Mr. LOGAN. Nothing except this, that you argue that this is not fair, and so did the Senator from Missouri the other day, because the vote was light at the adoption of the constitution. If it is not fair in the one case because the vote has fallen off, why fair in the other? In other words, there must be no falling off of votes in Dakota, if so it must be explained, but in South Carolina the vote may fall off nearly one-half in four years, and there it requires no explanation.

Mr. BUTLER. I remind the Senator that South Carolina is not applying for admission into the Union.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore I think his observations have about as much to do with this question as would the vote in Kamtchatka have.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the opinion of the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. I admire the Senator very much, and I regard his opinions very highly, but at the same time I will ask him to allow me to make my own deductions.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. You say South Carolina is in the Union. So do I; and I say she has never been out of it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad the other side say that.

Mr. LOGAN. But Dakota as a Territory is in, and as a State is out and wants to get in; and when you are in the Union with a million of people voting 91,000 votes at a Presidential election do not find fault with Dakota, this child that comes here asking the great mother to take her in as one of the family; do not find fault with her when she votes a third as many votes as your State does, more than half as many at one election, and on this constitution a third as many as your State, with a population of one-fourth as many as your State; find no further fault with the vote of this young sister that applies to be recognized along by your side.

Mr. BUTLER. I have found no fault with Dakota.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, then; do not.

Mr. BUTLER. I have found no fault with Dakota. I do not intend that the Senator shall put me in the attitude of finding fault with her. I compared the vote on this constitution, as I think I had a right to do; but whenever Dakota comes here, as I have said over and over again, in a regular, orderly, constitutional way, as I understand it, I shall vote for her admission; and I do not intend to be put in the position of antagonizing or finding fault with Dakota at all, because it is not correct.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator does not intend to be put in that position he had better correct his speech.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I stand by it. The Senator had better read what I said.

Mr. LOGAN. I have read it; you need have no fears on that point. I have read all the speeches that have been made on this subject. I occasionally read some things. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I think right in this connection that the "clique" business might be found on the other side. Let us see. The Republicans all voted—at least, when I say all there may have been a few exceptions, but the great mass of them voted. The Democrats did not vote. Why not? Because they did not want this State to be admitted. The Senator says it is a clique. What clique? The Democratic clique or a committee composed of Democrats, who notified the Democrats not to vote. Why? That the statesmen from South Carolina and Missouri might object to her admission on the ground that there was a "clique" in Dakota. The clique found response in the Democratic organ here in the city of Washington. Let me read what I find published on the 25th of January in the Post (the organ of our friends on the other side) about the admission of Dakota, and see if it does not comport exactly with the character of speeches which have been made in the Senate:

And now they are talking—

Says this newspaper—

about admitting Washington Territory into the Union. Washington happens to have a Democratic Delegate in Congress now, and the wary Republican spiders of the Senate committee are more than willing to compromise with the Democratic House on the admission of Dakota and Washington at the same time.

The result of this arrangement would be two new Republican States, four new Republican Senators, a Republican Senate from 1887 to 1889, and six certain Republican votes in the next electoral college. Washington and Dakota would come in in 1888 as Colorado did in 1876; and but for Colorado the Hayes fraud would never have been consummated.

The country wants no more raw commonwealths anyway. She has yet to digest Nevada and Colorado. And she wants no more crude statesmanship.

Take that article and put it in the belly of the speech of the Senator from Missouri, and it will accord precisely with what he said; and the insinuation of the Senator from South Carolina, in reference to a suspicion he had that there might be a "snap judgment" during this national Administration, is on a line with this article in the Post.

It will not do for Senators here to throttle this young State and put their opposition to its admission on the technical grounds they have. The true ground is that it is Republican and is not Democratic; and why not say so? It has every element of a State in all respects except recognition. And after eleven States have been admitted into the Union without an enabling act—nearly half the new States that have been admitted into the Union—when this twelfth one comes, it will not do for Senators to say that there must be an enabling act in order that the law may be complied with. Why, sir, there is no such law on the statute-books; there is no such provision in the Constitution; there has been no such principle laid down by statesmen either here or elsewhere, that it is necessary that a State should have an enabling act prior to her admission into the Union.

We might as well talk plainly with one another about these things when we do it without intending any offense. These precedents that I have given were established when Democrats controlled Congress. They where followed by Democrats whenever Democratic States applied for admission. The Democratic party has never failed in a single instance to admit a State into this Union if it came with Democratic Senators and a Democratic Congressman, if they had the power to admit them. But they have ever opposed as a party—and I state it as a fact—the admission of States that differed with them in politics. Everything must be complied with, the House of Representatives against the Senate politically; you must wait for an enabling act, that which perhaps Congress would not pass, before this State can be admitted; you must have that which Congress will not give before you can knock at the door of Congress for admission into this Union.

I do not wish to refer to that institution which has passed away except for the purpose of illustration; but while it existed in this country it was the policy of a certain party to never admit a free State unless a slave State came hand in hand into the Union whenever it could be done. No one will deny that. What then is the result? Slavery has passed away, but the principle of admitting a Democratic State, or a slave State with a free State, still exists; there is objection to the admission of a State that is politically opposed to them unless a State politically agreeing with them can come hand in hand into the Union. That is the point.

Then another objection is made, I find, in reading the speeches that have been made against the admission of Dakota. It is said by one Senator that we have enough States; we ought to be very careful about admitting States; we do not want any more States; no more States ought to be admitted without great scrutiny. This is the argument of the Senator from Missouri. I desire to examine this argument for a few minutes.

Suppose that principle had been adopted by the thirteen original States; suppose the thirteen original States had said, "We do not wish any more States in this Union; thirteen States are enough; we are the Government; you are outside; you are mere Territories, colonial dependencies; you can not be admitted as States." With all this great territory in the west, south of the Ohio River and north of the Ohio River, and west as far as our Territories extended, with a growing population driving the Indian in advance and developing a growth, a civilization, and a prosperity, what would have been the result? Soon the Territories would have had a greater population than the States. What then would have happened? The States would have been sending them governors, judges of their courts, collectors of the revenues, all the officers dependent upon national power, and they would have made the same cry against the operations of the government of the thirteen States that the colonies did against Great Britain.

The colonies objected to Great Britain's usurpation and power over them—the very same objections that would have been made by these people had these impositions been practiced on them. Yet no more States must be admitted! If no more States are to be admitted, what will be the result? All this great northwestern territory is to be held by the Government in a dependent condition, in a colonial state, subject their laws to revision, all their officers controlling, governing, and guiding them in their destiny, subject to the Government. Is that to be the result? When Senators say that these people have proceeded in a revolutionary manner, I say that if we had done this in behalf of the thirteen States originally against the Territories a revolution would have been inevitable, and no power on earth could have stayed it when the Territories attained a greater population than the thirteen States had.

Oh, but it is said by Senators the action of this people is revolutionary, because forsooth they or some of them inadvertently call themselves a State. Sir, revolutionary against what? Against the power of the Government? No, sir. The very action of these Senators who are trying to deprive the people of the Territories of the Statehood that they desire is more arbitrary and more calculated to force people to desperate means than any action the people themselves have taken. Sir, millions of people in a few years will be numbered in the Western Territories instead of the few hundred thousand there now. The time will come, sir, when that party which is ever changeable, except on the question of holding power in their own hands, will not oppose the admission of these people. Will any Senator tell me that, with a vast population in Territories having rich and fertile soil, the people industrious, energetic, and intelligent, this Government is going to continue to fasten officers upon them against their consent? And at the same time if complaint is made against this policy will it be said that this is revolution? I thought this, sir, a strange argument when made, coming from whence it did.

Mr. President, I dislike very much to refer to this matter in the absence of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but there are one or two things in his remarks to which I feel called upon to make reply. I repeat, sir, that true statesmanship does not require the inquiry to be made as to what States the people went from when settling in the Territory, nor their politics, but only into their civilization, their numbers and intelligence, the square miles in area of the territory settled, its productive capacity, &c., whether the soil and the climate are calculated to induce a fixed and permanent population. All these things being admitted, statesmanship demands the admission of the Territory, whether the people are Republican or Democratic.

I was very sorry to hear the Senator from Missouri say what he did in reference to our former troubles. I certainly should not have alluded to them in any way in the arguments that I should make on this question if it had not been for the unnecessary remarks made by the Senator from Missouri. He attributed an allusion to the soldiers to the Senators from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], but in reading the speech of the Senator from Iowa I do not find it. However, in the speech of the Senator from Indiana he alluded to the fact merely that a portion of the population of Dakota was made up of Union soldiers who had helped preserve the Union. The retort in reply to that by the Senator from Missouri was of a very severe character, and to that I have only to reply, that I should not have mentioned the fact that the "soldiers" had largely settled this Territory, as it is immaterial what the population is, whether soldier or other citizens, so it is good, honest, and true. No matter whether soldiers or other citizens, it is the number and character that we inquire into. But, sir, I wish now to know if in the Congress of the United States to mention the fact that soldiers have settled in a certain locality is to be considered an offense? Is the fact spoken that any portion of our people were patriots and fought to preserve the Union, to offend or insult any man or class of men in this country? Sir, why should it? If the Senator from Indiana had said confederate soldier and Union soldier and citizen it would have all been the same to me. So far as the recognition of this new State is concerned it is immaterial who they are, so they are good citizens; but the mere mention of soldiers brought out a stricture from the Senator from Missouri, in which he remarks that these things have been thrown out heretofore for the purpose of arousing the feelings of a certain class of people. Sir, I am sorry that any man should suspect for a moment that the mere mention of this fact would arouse any man to say that which might well be left unsaid on a question of this kind.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is due to the Senator from Missouri—of course I am not his champion at all, but he is sick in bed and therefore not able to speak for himself—that I should say I do not think the Senator from Illinois is doing him entire justice.

Mr. LOGAN. In what?

Mr. BUTLER. In the reference he has made to what the Senator from Missouri said in regard to the soldiers. The remarks of the Senator from Missouri, as I understood them, were made entirely in response to an observation of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Indiana had made some intimation, rather more than an intimation as it occurred to some of us on this side, that the opposition to Dakota was based, among other things, upon the fact that it was occupied by Union soldiers.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Illinois must in justice to me yield to allow me to ask the Senator from South Carolina to find any such intimation in any remark I made on this floor.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the construction put upon the Senator's remarks by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRISON. Then it was a misconstruction.

Mr. BUTLER. I think if the Senator from Missouri were here he would bear me out in it.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not what the Senator from Missouri understood, but what he was authorized to understand from any remark I made.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Indiana need not cast his eyes up to the reporters' gallery to see whether his remarks meet approbation or not. I simply stated, in justice to the Senator from Missouri, that I thought the Senator from Illinois was doing his position injustice in implying that he construed the remarks of the Senator from Indiana as intimating that the opposition of this side of the Chamber, at least so far as he and I were concerned, was instigated very largely by the fact that Dakota was inhabited by Union soldiers. That was an improper construction.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield one moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire simply to say to the honorable Senator from South Carolina that the direction in which I cast my eyes was a matter wholly in my own volition.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. And if I found some more attractive direction than that in which the Senator sits for me to look for the moment I hope it was without offense to him.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely right. I do not happen to be the reporter of a newspaper, and therefore I take it for granted that the Senator does not direct his gaze to me.

Mr. LOGAN. I must say, in response to the Senator from South Carolina, that the attempt on his part to place me in a false position will not succeed. In any attempt on his part to make it appear that I was attacking the Senator from Missouri he will find that he is mistaken. I was not quoting what the Senator from Missouri said. I said he made strictures on what the Senator from Indiana said, and I have turned to the speech of the Senator from Indiana. I propose to read what he said to show that there was no justification for the remarks that were made. Here is what the Senator from Indiana said:

> It is true of Dakota, as it is of all our Northwestern States, largely settled since the war, that the men who came home after bearing the heat of that great conflict, the men who established the Union of the States, and brought back the banner of their country in triumph, have in large numbers found new homes within her borders.

If there is anything that can be twisted in any way whatever in those remarks to show that there was a fling at anybody I should like to understand it. It was to that I was replying, because when he merely alluded to the fact that soldiers had settled there with other people, it brought out the assertion that an attempt was being made to prejudice the minds of the people, I say this in response to what was said then, without reference to the Senator from Missouri.

I have desired that the question of who was on this side or that side should not be brought up in the Senate Chamber except when the necessity arises for it on some question that should bring it out. I certainly do not desire to do it. I am sure that my mode of treating our friends on that side has not been of a character to show that I have bitterness in my heart; but when matters of this kind come up and questions are thrown out and insinuations made, I only call the attention of the country to the fact that in the part of the country where I reside the question as to who did this or that, as was said in the war, is not the question before the country. The people there are not discussing or talking about these things. If you will take that side of the Chamber and this side of the Chamber and count the members who have gone from the camps of either, the people will see which section of this country cares most about that and broods over it the longest and enjoys the bitterness of it most.

It is no matter of enjoyment to me to allude to these things; it is more in sorrow than in anger that I reply to matters of this kind. I am sorry to see them brought in and handled in the manner in which they were here the other day. I will give in my speech the remarks of the Senator from Missouri and refrain from comment in his absence:

> Mr. VEST. Why is it necessary, or was it necessary then, that in making this declaration of non-partisan feeling both the Senators from Indiana and Iowa saw proper to drag into the debate the fact that Dakota being a Republican Territory or State, as they claimed it to be, was the only cause in fact why its admission to the Union is now opposed upon this side of the Senate? Why was it that both these Senators saw proper to go further and say that the ex-Union soldiers who had populated Dakota were restive under their exclusion from the Union because they thought they had a right to be admitted into the country whose life they had saved?
> I make no namby-pamby appeal to the war sentiment of the country. I make no apology for my past history and no professions for the future. I am here accredited by two and a half million people as intelligent, law-abiding, conservative as any upon this continent, and their votes are my credentials. I have voted consistently and persistently in this Chamber for the most liberal pensions to the men to whom I was opposed in the late unfortunate struggle, happily closed twenty years ago, and while I avow now all absence of hostility and prejudice, let it be believed or not believed, I distinctly and emphatically oppose the sentiment that any man is entitled to peculiar privileges in this country before the law or before the Constitution because he fought under any flag, because he espoused any cause, because he did his duty to the principles and convictions he held and as he understood them. Justice should be done to all, and the question now before the Senate is one appealing to the unlimited discretion of Congress, and that alone. Why bring in these adventitious circumstances? Why attempt, for it can result in nothing else, to thrust into every question, financial, social, and religious, that is brought before the American people the dead issues of a dead strife, when the country, as we heard the other day, is now for the first time really and honestly being cemented together by the glorious memories of the past and the bright anticipations of the future.
> Union soldiers are restive because Dakota is kept out of the Union! Before I conclude this address I shall undertake to show that soldiers as gallant as any who fought under the Union flag and amid "shot and shell and saber stroke" demonstrated their devotion to the Union are as heartily opposed to the passage of the bill before the Senate as any of those whose patriotic endeavor has been cited as an argument upon this floor. What can be the result or the object of such appeals as these except an indirect statement to the people in Dakota and to the country at large that many of us who were upon the other side in that unfortunate strife are now fighting to exclude Dakota, and that, forsooth, this is the sole reason of our parliamentary action in this body?
> Mr. President, this is not the first time I have heard this charge. This is not the first time it has been used to inflame partisan feeling and sectional hate. Whatever may have been the object of the distinguished Senators who use it here to-day, I have seen it before clothed in not such persuasive tones, not such dulcet accents and set phrase, but containing the very same idea, the same sentiment and prejudice which we heard yesterday and the day before from the distinguished Senators.

Mr. President, it is not from the States north of this line once drawn between contending forces that bitterness is found. It is not north of this line that injustice is encouraged and inculcated. It is not north of this line that a desire exists to deprive people of their rights in this Union. It is not in that liberal part of the country where the people are energetic and where they are educated that people are usually deprived of their rights. It is not in that part of the country that the people have ever been denied the right to vote for President of the United States. When I say that, I mean the right to vote at the polls. The States north of this line have not failed to allow all citizens entitled under the law to participate in the affairs of Government. So when the insinuation is made that illiberal views are entertained and prejudices enjoyed in that part of the country it is a mistake.

Now, Mr. President, passing to another part of the discussion, what does this mean—this process to be adopted to prevent the admission of States into the Union? Is it a part of a plan, sir, which may not have been matured and well understood by all—is it that no more new States shall come into the Union unless they are Democratic, or unless a Democratic State and a Republican State shall come in hand in hand. Is it the old doctrine, the old theory of the old-fashioned Democracy which believed that slavery was a Divine institution and that they were entitled to rule and control the people of this great Government, that is to control us hereafter in this respect? I find an article in a paper to which I call attention. I do not know the character of the paper; the Senator from South Carolina can tell me. It is the Charleston News and Courier.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a Democratic paper in South Carolina, at Charleston.

Mr. LOGAN. I said it was perhaps a part of a scheme to keep out Republican Territories or States, and then to hold fast to this Government, and I find it cropping out in different directions. In this copy of the Charleston News and Courier I find an article in which the proposition is made that the colored people, according to the apportionment of the legislative districts in South Carolina, are entitled to a majority of the Legislature. It so states it. I believe there are but few colored people, however, in the Legislature.

In order to prevent this calamity, as the writer calls it, a certain thing must be done, and that suggestion has been responded to by others. What is it? That the Legislature must pass a property qualification act, and that property qualification must not apply to individuals but to counties, so that the property in a county, not the individuals, shall entitle the county to so many representatives; and he says according to that, in a certain number of counties where wealthy people live and where there are more white people than colored it will give them more representatives than will be given to the other counties, outnumbering the others because they are poorer and therefore will not have the amount of property. There is the proposition made in that Democratic paper to deprive the people of the right to control by majorities, but by this contrivance a certain class shall control. The article to which I refer is as follows:

> REPRESENTATION AND TAXATION.
> A correspondent, whose thoughtful letter was published yesterday, advises that the constitution of the State be so amended that both population and property shall be specifically represented in the State Legislature, as was the law in South Carolina from 1808 to 1868. The prime reason for the proposition is the necessity of protecting the property-holding class from the raids of those who have little or no property and who pay no taxes. In considering the suggestion of our correspondent, some important facts require to be borne steadily in mind.

By the United States census the total population of South Carolina in 1880 was 995,577. The population by race was: White, 391,105; colored, 604,332; Chinese and Indians, 140.

Scrutinizing the population by race and by counties, it is found that the colored people were in the majority in 1880 in twenty-five of the thirty-three counties in the State.

The house of representatives consists of one hundred and twenty-four members, assigned in proportion to population. On the basis of the census of 1880 the counties in which the whites are in the majority are entitled in all to twenty-four members of the house of representatives, and the counties in which the colored people are in the majority are entitled to one hundred members.

There are in these simple facts, if they are carefully studied and their consequences are understood, the strongest argument for some such modification of the constitution as our correspondent proposes.

The colored people are in the majority in South Carolina, and the representation in the Legislature is required to be in proportion to population. The time must come when the colored vote will be energized again and make itself fully felt. When it shall again be an instrument in the hands of white politicians, it will count for all it is worth. What, then, will be the condition of the white people of the State if the representation in the Legislature continues to be determined by numbers alone, without regard to intelligence or the possession of property?

It was proposed some time ago that the constitution be so amended as to impose an educational qualification, but there were serious objections to this plan which need not be mentioned here.

There can not be any discrimination on the score of race, color, or previous condition of servitude in regulating the suffrage. If there shall not be an educational qualification, we fall back upon a property qualification; and we consider this to be a wise mode of meeting a growing difficulty, when, as is advised by our correspondent, the representation of property, as such, is combined with representation by population.

The old plan was to give to the election districts of the State one member of the house of representatives for every sixty-second part of the whole number of white inhabitants in the State, and one member for every sixty-second part of the taxes raised by the Legislature. Eliminating from this the element of race, it is advised that sixty-two members be now apportioned among the several counties in proportion to population, and sixty-two members be apportioned in proportion to the amount of real and personal property on which taxes are paid.

Lest it might be supposed that this would change materially the representation of the different counties, our correspondent gives a tabular statement showing the representation according to population under the census of 1880 and the representation on the basis of combined population and property.

The new mode would increase Charleston's representation from 8 to 15 and Aiken's representation from 3 to 4, while Colleton would be reduced from 5 to 4, Edgefield from 6 to 5, Kershaw from 3 to 2, Laurens from 4 to 3, Marlborough from 3 to 2, and Sumter from 5 to 4. The equilibrium between the sections would be little disturbed, and a glaring wrong would be righted. What is that wrong?

According to the recent returns, the assessed value of the taxable property in the State is $151,978,184. On this basis, each member of the Legislature, on an average, represents property to the amount of $1,225,630. But a glance at the table, as compiled by our correspondent, shows how gross is the inequality.

The members from Charleston, on the basis of the census of 1880, would represent $3,309,247 each, while the members from Edgefield, Beaufort, Barnwell, Chesterfield, Clarendon, Colleton, and a number of other counties represent less than a million dollars each. Or putting it in another way, and always on the basis of the census of 1880, there is $16,669,000 of property in Charleston which is taxed without representation, over and above the $9,804,000 to be represented by eight members. Charleston, in other words, must do one-twentieth of the tax-levying and one-sixth of the tax-paying.

There is great complaint already in the State on the subject of the incidence of taxation by reason of the inequality of assessment. If facts count for anything in political calculations South Carolina is in danger, as no other State is, of being taxed at will by voters who pay no taxes. The plan which has been submitted will protect the people against this, and nowhere is such protection more necessary, we imagine, than in the upper part of the State. As well as can be judged, the majority of the voting population is to be found in the lower counties. And these counties, by representation in proportion to population alone, can control South Carolina legislation.

We have no doubt that the proposition to amend the constitution will excite surprise, and it is not unlikely that heedless persons will deride it and even denounce it; but the white people of the State—the property-holding class—need some safeguard, and we know of no better safeguard than that which has been described.

It is absolute, as far as it goes, in securing representation for property, and, in estimating that representation, there can be no discrimination on account of race or color of the tax-payer. The thrifty and well-to-do colored man, as a property-holder, will be protected in the same manner as the intelligent and progressive white farmer and mechanic in the State.—Charleston News and Courier, January 9, 1886.

The Senator from South Carolina laughs. I do not see why he should not laugh, because it is the way control in that part of the country will remain in the hands of his friends when all other methods fail. The programme, in order to control in spite of majorities, is now cropping out, and where? In the very State, sir, where all the leading ideas of Democracy have cropped out for fifty years. The starting of Democratic theories, the starting of Democratic doctrines has been from that State, and well it has been done, too.

Mr. BUTLER. While the honorable Senator was a distinguished leader of that party?

Mr. LOGAN. I was never a leader of that party; I was a follower, and I followed so far behind that I got left, and went into another. [Laughter.]

I was going to say for the benefit of the Senator from South Carolina that the Democratic party never originated an idea for fifty years that did not first germinate in South Carolina, and I was going to give that State the credit for it. Whether it led to good or evil results makes no difference, its germ was planted in that State. The first lead of Mr. Calhoun was in the direction of protection. The very minute he changed, the whole Democratic party changed; and then it lodged on free trade. When Calhoun started on his raid the Democratic party followed him, and the ideas implanted in that party grew and spread until the Democratic party had no life except the life that sprang from the ideas promulgated by the State of South Carolina. It finally led them into deep water, where they have struggled ever since.

Sir, they led it ably and well when right, and with equal ability when wrong; and were wrong more times than right, unfortunately, for the whole country. I mean that out of no disrespect whatever to the Senator; I speak only of the historical facts.

But still South Carolina is in the lead. The first suggestion is made from the Democratic papers of South Carolina as to how control can be maintained hereafter against the popular will. "Keep your Territories out," says the Post. "Keep your Territories out," says the Senator from Missouri. "No more States shall be admitted," say these statesmen. Why, sir? Ah, sir, they are Republican; this is the underlying cause, this is clearly the true inwardness of the objections by the Democracy led by the Senator from South Carolina.

Therefore they feel that if "they can keep new States out they will continue to control the country in the line of Democracy;" but if they come in "they must control it anyhow." "How will they do it?" They will do it by a property qualification, and put it over the States in the South, where the colored people are in the way. That Democratic idea, however strange we may view it now, will grow faster than any one now believes. But, sir, whenever the necessity arises it will be adopted by the Democracy in the States where there is a probability of the Republicans controlling with the aid of the colored voter when and where he may vote without let or hindrance.

Mr. President, I desire to say in reference to the people of Dakota, without speaking of them in any other sense than that of citizens of the United States, that many of them went from the State of Illinois from near where I reside. Many of them were my neighbors and friends. In one little county just northwest from Chicago nine hundred people went to the Territory of Dakota in one year, all intelligent, energetic, and honest people; and, sir, may I not appeal to this great country, to its magnanimity, and the justice that it ought to mete out to those people, that they be permitted to exercise the same rights that are guaranteed and given to States that have been admitted into the Union on the same theory and basis that this Territory now applies for admission as a new State?

Sir, it was the idea of our patriotic fathers that as fast as the Territories acquired a population and all the other prerequisites they should be admitted as sister States. Why is it that we have grown so wise of late? Why is it that we of latter years find reasons that were not held in past times against new States? Why is it that party lines are drawn so strictly? Why is it that one side of the Chamber votes one way and the other side votes the other way on this question? Sir, it will not do to say that logic or reason fails; it will not do to put it on the ground that all are wrong on one side and all are right on the other. That is not the ground on which it must stand. It is on the ground of partisanship; it is because of the feeling that has grown up in one party against the other, a feeling which ought not to exist. We ought to be honest with one another; we ought to be honest with the people. We ought to represent our constituents fairly and justly, and we ought, too, to represent the Territories fairly and justly, as they are not entitled to representation in and of themselves.

I heard a gentleman say the other day that they were already represented. That is a mistake. A Territory is represented nowhere. They have a mere agent who hangs around on the outskirts of the other House without a vote; there, perhaps, to watch for some little measure beneficial to his Territory. He has no rights as a Representative. They, the people of the Territories, are outside of the pale of representation, and you deny them the right your fathers were denied by England. When they are ready to become a State and have respresentation lawfully, you say no, true we will tax you, but will deny you the right of representation. You desire a quarter of a million of people to stay out of doors, as it were, and tax them and represent them without their consent. You furnish them officers whom they do not choose, you deny them the rights that you yourselves enjoy. Why? Because the powers that be are afraid that their political ideas are not in harmony with Democracy, it will prevent us having a Democratic governor, secretary of State, and judges to mold public opinion. Ah! sir, there is "the rub."

Eleven States have come in in the same manner, but that makes no difference. You will go back on the precedents of your own party and Congress. You will set at naught the rule that has been laid down for the admission of many States. You will deny the citizen the right that you claim for yourselves, and why? Forsooth, Mr. President, the Democracy must have the offices for the benefit of the party.

Ah, Mr. President, hide it as you may, draw the veil over it as you will, the gauze manufactured by the opposition is so faulty in its warp and woof that it is easily seen through and discovered that it is clearly for the reason that because her Senators and Members of Congress are not of the political faith of the objecting Senators she must stay out. Sir, I hope the time will never come when I shall stand before the American people and plead one technicality after another to prevent citizens who are my equals in all respects from enjoying the same rights that I do, when they have all the necessary requirements and elements to entitle them to the same privileges, because they shall be Democratic. No Territory can knock at this door and ask me to vote for its admission, whether Democratic or Republican, with the population, the wealth, and all the requirements, with a constitution republican in form, and I be found opposing it, whether they come under an enabling act or not. When we shall show a willingness to do this, then, sir, we will be doing that justice in a proper spirit that should be meted out by the representatives of this great people to a dependent people, as these are who now apply for admission into this Union of States, that their star may be placed upon the flag of a redeemed nation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I shall not engage in this debate for the purpose of answering the arguments of any Senator, but for the purpose of stating the grounds upon which I shall give my vote upon the bill, feeling that I have done a duty to myself and my constituents if I should be able to make that ground plain. The closing remark of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], if intended in seriousness, would reflect an injustice at least upon some of us on this side of the Chamber, for as to myself I do here asseverate that my judgment in regard to the admission of Dakota into the Union is not in the slightest degree to be affected by the condition of politics existing in that Territory.

The admission of a State into the Union must always be, of course, in some sense a political question, and it must always in some sense affect the relations of political parties; but those Senators who find themselves unable to rise above party considerations in dealing with a question of this kind merely prove that they are incapable of discharging the highest functions of the grand office which they hold.

The Senate in considering this proposition has before it the most important thing that we can possibly engage in considering. There is no event in American history which is comparable at all to that of the admission of a State into the Union, unless it may perhaps be some great event like that which grew out of the civil war between the States, the question of the preservation of the life of the Union. But in the civil and ordinary administration of our affairs and in keeping up with the march of progress which our people are making so grandly in this country no question can address itself to the Senate of the United States so important, none that demands such judicial examination, such care, such circumspection as the admission of a State into the Union. The powers which we exercise here are judicial and legislative. More than that, they rise into the embodiment of a great national idea, in which we look upon and consider and deal with a question as a great supreme nation.

The first inquiry that ought always to be made in respect of any body of citizens of the United States who claim admission into the Union as a State is in its nature a judicial inquiry. We inquire, first, what is the state of the law that entitles them to recognition as a State. Unless we understand what is the state of the law that does so entitle them to recognition we can not properly understand the question and we can not decide it judicially.

The admission of States into the American Union is not confined by the Constitution to the admission of new States to be formed out of the Territories belonging to this country, but we have determined in our own practice, as well as by the express authority of the Constitution, that there are two other cases, one where a State is formed by the consent of the Legislatures of several States and by the consent of Congress out of the existing territory of existing States, a power that I suppose was claimed to have been exercised in the case of the admission of West Virginia into the Union. I shall not stop to comment upon that event to say whether I think the power was properly exercised then or not, but still I will remark as I go along that some questions arose in that event which perhaps will hereafter come back to plague us.

Another manner of obtaining States is illustrated in the case of Texas, where we brought a State into the American Union that was not at the time any part of our territory. It was an independent government, having its own autonomy, having its own sovereignty, having its own supremacy, and having its recognition also as such independent government by the United States and by other great powers of the world.

What was the first act to be performed in the admission of Texas into the Union? It was an act of the very highest judicial character. It was an act by which we ascertained according to our own judgment, concurring with the judgment of the people of Texas, that it was a free, independent, sovereign state, not existing under the laws of the United States, and having no possible connection with the laws of the United States, and not the subject or dependent of any other power.

After we had determined that Texas had the right of sovereignty and the right of supremacy in every sense as an independent nation, we found that we were prepared, shall I say, to treat with her? Yes, not through the agency of the treaty-making power, but through the agency of a power expressly granted in the Constitution to Congress—not to the President and the Senate. We were prepared to treat with her through commissioners to ascertain her sovereign will in respect of coming into the American Union, and then we were prepared to decide upon her record as presented, whether she was a free, sovereign, and independent state. That was all judicial; that was all according to law; that was all in obedience to law.

The next act which we performed was simply one of recognition—first, that she was an independent state; secondly, that she was entitled to be, and was, a State of the American Union; and in that act of recognition on our part and consent on her part Texas became the great empire State of the Southwest, and is in the Union, to remain upon an equality with all the original thirteen States.

In forming the Union itself the thirteen original States recognized each other as being sovereign Commonwealths, free from the dominion of the Crown of Great Britain, and at liberty to come in or to remain out, as they chose; so that nine out of the thirteen States were only necessary in order to form a more perpetual compact of the present Constitution, or the original Articles of Confederation. There was recognition by each supreme sovereign government of other supreme sovereign governments when the Union was formed.

That recognition is no less distinct when we admit a new State into the Union, whether we admit it, like Texas, from foreign territory, or whether we admit it, as Colorado was admitted, from our own territory. In either case a sovereign is recognized by Congress, but in neither case is it created by Congress.

There is a point of time at which a State becomes such and before which it was not a State. That is the moment of our recognition by the acts of Congress. There is a condition existing the moment after the recognition is established that did not exist before, and a condition which is absolutely irrevocable by any act of Congress; for while Congress may recognize and Congress may admit, Congress can neither control nor destroy the States beyond the powers expressly conferred upon it under the Constitution.

The question presented here to-day is, therefore, a judicial question. The question is whether under our laws and Constitution, without respect to precedents, whether they be good or whether they be bad, the paper which is presented to us as the constitution of the State of Dakota and these people who assume to represent the body of the people of the Territory of Dakota have, in conformity with the laws of the United States, placed themselves in such an attitude as that the Congress of the United States is under a moral obligation to recognize them in that character and to admit these people as a State; for if they have come in violation of law, if they have come in despite of law, if they have contravened the statutes of the United States in their preparatory steps to get here, we have either to repeal those statutes to get them out of our way and out of their way, or else we must cure it by an act of condonation which admits the breach of the law and forgives it. Our attitude as judges to determine here whether Dakota is in a situation to come in as a State involves, first of all, the question whether we shall give respect to our own laws or whether we shall assist in their violation in order to bring in a State by force through the breach made in the law.

Sir, I maintain, and I shall always maintain, as I have always done, that after the Congress of the United States has enacted a law which has become such by the consent of both bodies and the approval of the President, the Senate and the other House and the President are all equally bound by it, and it is as much the oath of a Senator as it is of the President of the United States to maintain and support the laws of this country. We have no right, because we can enact one law, to break another. We have a statute-book that is full of interesting and useful statutes. It is no part of the power or duty of the Senate either under the obligation of its oath or in any parliamentary sense to nullify, disregard, or break a law, or to sustain other people in nullifying, disregarding, or breaking laws in order that they may acquire a certain status that is agreeable to us in which they may become States. I repeat, therefore, that this is a question of law, and the Senate is bound by the law and must support it, and should not violate the law.

Need I say more to emphasize the value of this position? Surely my feeble strength of intellect and body would be totally inadequate to describe the importance of the theme upon which I am now dwelling. Coming generations of men will rise to thank those men who, in the Senate of the United States to-day, have upheld the banner of the law as the rule for the government of Senates and Houses and Presidents and people alike. This is a Government of laws, and if we should raise our hearts in thankfulness to Almighty God for the supreme blessing which has crowned this constitutional effort of ours to govern according to the will of the people, our utmost thanks must be due to Him for having inspired us with a sentiment that this is a Government of laws. No man great or small, nobody powerful or weak, can trample upon the law to the injury of any, or escape its denunciations and its sanctions when that law is violated.

I am here to-day to appeal to the laws of the United States and to ask the Senate to preserve them in regard to this great question whether the people of Dakota are here asking us in the name of the law and in accordance with it for admission into the United States as one of the sovereign sisters of this great Republic. Are these the people of Dakota who come here? Who are the people of Dakota? How do we know who are the people of Dakota? We refer to the act of organization, and we see certain boundaries there, certain rights of citizenship conferred under our statutes; and when we speak of the people of Dakota, we stultify ourselves unless we speak of the whole body as described in the law. Who are the people of Dakota? Not those represented on this floor by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Illinois. They are a mere junta, a mere faction, a mere figment, a particular set of pretenders who are usurpers of power in the Territory against the law. What is Dakota under the law? A Territory and a commonwealth with certain distinct and defined boundaries, boundaries fixed by an act of Congress which has never been repealed or altered.

In the act of March 2, 1861, incorporating that Territory, that idea was so distinctly and so carefully preserved as that the Congress after it had fixed the boundaries with precise definition added the following proviso to that act:

Provided, further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said Territory into two or more Territories in such manner and at such times as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion thereof to any other Territory or State.

There is a power reserved in the charter. That charter is as much the constitution of the Territory of Dakota to-day as this book that lies before me is the Constitution of the United States. In the very charter there was reserved the right to whom to alter the boundaries? To Congress expressly. The right was given to whom to partition the Territory with reference to its admission as States? To Congress, and only to Congress. Who has assumed the right to partition it? The Territorial Legislature, it is said. Grant, for the sake of the argument, but not as the fact, that this has been done fairly and in form legally, if you please, in the exercise of whatever power the Territorial Legislature may possess; concede for the argument that the Territorial Legislature has done this—the Territorial Legislature is not Congress. Never can it be within the power of any part of the people of that Territory to alter its boundaries or to divide its Territorial domain, because in doing that the Legislature of Dakota would be exercising a power that in this very act of incorporation has been reserved expressly to Congress. The formality of the act or the honesty of it can not create for this Legislature a power that the law refuses to it.

In maintaining the laws of the United States am I to be expected to say that that act which prohibits the Territorial Legislature from interfering with the subject at all is respected by that Legislature when it violates the very fundamental law of that Territory, and shall gentlemen say that I am insincere or partisan in my opposition to a violation of it by the Territorial Legislature, conceding, as I have said before, for the sake of the argument, that they might legislate even upon the subject or that they had legislated upon it?

So much for the boundaries and so much for the people. So much for the boundaries, to show that Congress alone can divide the Territory or rearrange them; so much for the people, to show that a portion of the people in that Territory can not unite themselves into a political organization of any kind with authority of Territorial laws and ask us to violate the laws of the United States in order to give recognition to them as a State.

Further, in regard to the legislative power of that Territory, the act of 1861 provides—

SEC. 4. That the legislative power and authority of said Territory shall be vested in the governor and a Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly shall consist of a council and a house of representatives.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 6. That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.

I have read the provision of the act about the changing of Territorial boundaries or interference with them, and here in the grant of legislative power to that tribunal is the express prohibition put upon that Legislature that all of their acts shall be consistent with this act—not consistent with some general idea of public justice, not consistent with some imaginary thought about the sovereignty of the people of the Territory and their rights of local self-government, but consistent, and consistent only with the act of Congress which gave to that Legislature all the power it possesses, and expressly restrained its authority to certain defined limits.

We can only discover the sovereignty where it is the lawful expression of the will of all the people in the manner prescribed by law, and only in that way can we be expected to recognize it.

We have other officers there besides the Legislature. We have governors, we have judges, we have the representatives of course in the Legislature. Let us see the sort of tutorship that this Territory, like all the other Territories, is placed under by Congress. Those men, though some of them are elected by the people of Dakota, are officers of the Government of the United States, I might say in every sense, certainly in a very large sense. Really, I do not know how to say that they are not officers of the United States Government in any of the functions that they exercise. We see it provided in the eleventh section of the act of 1861:

The governor shall receive an annual salary of $1,500 as governor—

It has been raised since, I believe—

The governor shall receive an annual salary of $1,500 as governor and $1,000 as superintendent of Indian affairs; the chief-justice and associate justices shall each receive an annual salary of $1,800; the secretary shall receive an annual salary of $1,800. The said salaries shall be paid quarter-yearly at the Treasury of the United States. The members of the Legislative Assembly shall be entitled to receive $3 each per day during their attendance at the session thereof, and $3 for every twenty miles' travel in going to or returning from the said sessions, estimated according to the nearest usually traveled route. There shall be appropriated annually the sum of $1,000, to be expended by the governor, to defray the contingent expenses of the Territory. There shall also be appropriated annually a sufficient sum, to be expended by the secretary of the Territory and upon an estimate to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses; and the secretary of the Territory shall annually account to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the manner in which the aforesaid amount shall have been expended.

Not only are these our agents there with limited authority, but they are supported by the Government of the United States. Annual appropriations upon estimates are made out of the Treasury of the United States to nurture and sustain those men in what? In their legislative duties, their legislative duties as restrained and restricted in this charter, not in some new scheme or enterprise for organizing a State government. The legislative assemblage which authorizes the meeting of the constitutional convention at Huron appropriated $20,000 for its expenses. The money may have been drawn by taxation from the people of Dakota; I do not know; it maks no difference; the question is upon the power of that Legislature to appropriate it to a purpose of that kind. That would depend upon the power of the Legislature to give constitutionality or legality to the body when met.

Suppose they had appropriated $20,000 to a church, $20,000 to a debating society, $20,000 to a Democratic political conference, or to a Republican political conference, they would have been equally within the limits of their authority in doing that. They would have had just as much right to do it as they had to appropriate it for that supposititious convention, that thing which might exist or might not according to a vote not of the people of Dakota but of a part of the people of Dakota.

That act of appropriation, however, did not apply to the people of Dakota. They were not to enjoy the advantages of it. The Legislature disregarded the fact that there was a great body-politic, a commonwealth there which was in every section of the Territory entitled to equal respect of the laws and equal provision in the laws. They voted $20,000 to be applicable to the assistance of certain gentlemen who might be elected to a convention of one-half of the Territory in order to ordain a political party and a political power there through which men could be wrapped in Senator's togas, and into whose hands the scepters of government might be given. As the outcome of this new scheme of usurpation the legislation appropriated $20,000. If in accounting for that money they have to come before the Secretary of the Treasury, I suppose we shall know what was done with it. I do not know whether they will have to do that or not.

I wish to read something more about the membership of that legislation. I read from section 8 of the same act, and I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to this section, because I think that in the report and in the debate that has gone on upon the bill perhaps it has been entirely overlooked. I do not remember to have heard any reference to it. Section 8 provides—

That no member of the Legislative Assembly shall hold or be appointed to any office which shall have been created, or the salary or emoluments of which shall have been increased, while he was a member, during the term for which he was elected, and for one year after the expiration of such term; and no person holding a commission or appointment under the United States except postmasters shall be a member of the Legislative Assembly, or shall hold any office under the government of said Territory.

The use of the $20,000 to which I have just referred was to pay the expenses of delegates to a convention to be assembled at Huron, to be elected by the people, as was said. When those men met there they took oaths of office, they qualified as officers of the Territory. They assumed that the Territorial Legislature had transferred to them so much of its power given under the acts of Congress or usurped, whichever the case may be, as was necessary to enable them to become members of a constitutional convention and to enter upon the ordination of a constitution for Dakota Territory and a compact between that Territory and the United States, a compact in the nature of a treaty.

We see what the prohibition is, that no member of a Legislature shall hold an office. I should like to ask the honorable chairman of the committee how many of the men who were in that Legislature were in the convention at Huron.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no knowledge of a single one, and there may have been several.

Mr. MORGAN. There may have been several?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know. That is a simple conjecture.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is not prepared to deny it.

Mr. HARRISON. To deny it? No; I am not. It is a subject into which I have never looked. I have no knowledge in the world about it. The Senator may assume it to be either way, just as he pleases to think.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has omitted to look into a very important question which bears on the constitutionality of the action of the Legislature.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it was for the Senator from Alabama to look into it, for he himself has raised the question. None was raised in my mind.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; it is for the Senator in charge of this bill to know whether the body was a body organized according to law; for we are judges here, and when they bring a constitution before us ordained by men who are disqualified by the laws of Congress from acting, it is for him to look into it and report on it. I am not here in the sense of trying to oppose it merely because I have an opportunity to vote against it, but I am here in the sense of trying to find out every fact which will influence my judgment upon the question. Suppose every member of the Legislature who voted to appropriate $20,000 to organize this Dakota constitution had gone into that convention and become a member of it. If one may do it, all may do it. Would that have been a legal body? Would it have been a body organized according to the constitution of Dakota, as I call this act of Congress? Assuredly not.

I wish to show exactly what was the object, or one of the main objects, of that convention. It is said in the sacred Book, and I believe there is no higher authority than that, that if you want to understand the quality of a tree you look at its fruits always. You do not expect to find hickory-nuts under an orange tree, nor oranges under a walnut tree. I find among the members of the constitutional convention who ordained this constitution and now present it so pathetically to the Congress of the United States, claiming that they represent the sovereignty of the people of Dakota not merely in the constitution ordained but in the State government organized under the constitution, the following gentlemen, members of that constitutional convention: Hon. A. J. Edgerton, who is now a Senator of the United States in prospect; Hon. G. C. Moody, also a Senator in prospect; Hon. A. E. Frank, lieutenant-governor; Hon. Frank Alexander, secretary of state; Hon. Robert Dollard, attorney-general; Hon. T. D. Kanouse, Delegate to Congress; Hon. D. Carson, supreme court judge; Hon. A. G. Kellam, supreme court judge; Hon. J. E. Bennett, supreme court judge; Hon. Joseph Ward, member of the State executive committee; Hon. Hugh J. Campbell, member of the State executive committee. I have heard a statement made, which I believe to be correct, that fifteen members of that convention were members of the Territorial Legislature. If it be true that "by their fruits ye shall know them," we understand the whole affair.

Mr. GEORGE. How many members were in the body?

Mr. MORGAN. There were one hundred and eleven in the convention, of whom ninety attended.

Mr. HARRISON. Ninety-odd.

Mr. MORGAN. The patriotism of this band of gentlemen, while it does not rest under the slightest suspicion, takes into it a flavor of interest, of self-promotion, when we consider how very many of them got the most exalted offices in that proposed State government, and that they are here now, not for the sole purpose of asking us to admit Dakota into the Union as a State, but for the purpose also of asking us to admit Dakota and them into the Union as a State. As the bill is framed, as the petition is worded, as the executive committee have ordained it, you can not separate between the parties who have been elected to these high offices and the constitution and the Statehood of Dakota without severing an artery that would kill them as quick as it would have killed the Siamese twins to have cut the band that bound them together. One and inseparable are the proposed officers and the proposed State.

I should feel a little more freedom in the discussion of this question if it was a State applying here with a constitution which after admission might go on appealing to the voice of its people to organize its Statehood under the respective offices provided for in that constitution; but I feel cramped and constrained when in taking this State of Dakota into the Union we must take in as the Senators from that State gentlemen who have been elected by a Legislature of the State which Legislature was provided for by a convention of the State of which they were the chief and leading members. They have put too many eggs in one basket, sir, and I feel not the slightest hesitancy in saying to these gentlemen, "You must go back to the people of Dakota and try your chances before those people after we have informed them that the Congress of the United States has erected a State in that country," and then they shall have come out to the elections by their own consent, believing that they are doing something worth talking about, to vote for governors and Senators and members of the Legislature and all this other retinue of great officers provided for in the State constitution.

I do not know what right the House of Representatives has got to admit Senators on this floor; I do not know what right the President of the United States has got either to admit a Senator here or to veto a bill bringing him into the Senate; but the Constitution says that Congress may admit new States. That means Congress in its Congressional power, the act of Congress accompanied with the approval of the President, a legislative act as well as a judicial act. Suppose that the House of Representatives, not feeling that they have a right to admit Senators on this floor, should say, "We propose to strike out so much of this measure as recognizes this retinue of Senators and other officers who have come here demanding admission into the Union," and send the bill back to us, will we vote it in again just as it is now, or would the Senator from Indiana—I ask him the question—recede from his attempt to bring in this retinue of officers and say, "I will take the Constitution and the Statehood as the House provides by striking out all about the officers; I will take it in that form and let Dakota come in, and let a new set of officers be selected by that State hereafter under this constitution and under laws enacted in accordance with it?"

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator ask a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. If he wants a reply I will give it to him briefly. Whenever I saw a disposition on the part of any one on that side of the Chamber to make any reasonable proposition which seemed likely to bring to the support of this main proposition, the admission of South Dakota as a State, any portion of Senators, I have shown always a disposition to meet it; but when these things are merely presented as objections to the bill and are not accompanied by any protestations on the part of Senators on that side of the Chamber that if such amendments were made they would support the movement, then I prefer to go on with my bill as I have it.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, one of the greatest committees of this body, a gentleman who is in a distinguished sense worthy of the position, frames his bill and brings it before the Senate with a view and expectation of meeting a compromise arrangement on this side by which we shall propose to strike out the officers and leave the constitution of the State to stand. That is the attitude. Now, if the Senator is gambling with us on the chances of success, let me inform him I am a judge in this case that he can not gamble with.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not the judicial qualities of the gentleman that would terrify me from engaging in a scheme of that kind, but other qualifications that I know he and his associates possess. They would beat me in that game.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator comes here with a bill to admit the State of Dakota and also two Senators upon this floor, for if Congress passes the bill, when the President has signed it those two Senators are rightfully here. Not that only, but there is a Delegate in the other House elected, and we say the House must receive him. Not that only, but there is a governor, a supreme bench, a circuit bench, and various other officers who have been elected under that supposed or so-called State government. I ask the Senator, in the event the bill should be amended in the other House so as to strike out those Senators and that Delegate and the governor, &c., would he be willing to admit Dakota as she is?

Mr. HARRISON. I can only say to that, that I hope the House of Representatives will give me an opportunity.

Mr. MORGAN. By making such an amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. By making any amendment that looks to the admission, the main proposition of the bill. If the Senator will pardon me, I say to him now that this is not a scheme to advance the personal interest of any man or set of men. It is a scheme to secure to those people, as we believe, their rights under the Constitution to complete self-government.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, Mr. President, when the Senator from Indiana saw that an endeavor of this kind was being made which he himself would regret, when he saw that these men were coming here claiming the right to these offices, when he himself says on this floor he would be willing to strike out these men, destroy their offices, and take the State with the constitution, I think the Senator before he ever expects to find fault with anybody on this side for our position on this question should first answer to the Senate and to himself why it was that he was only willing to take that ground after the House had acted against the admission of these officers.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe the election of these officers has been by a free and fair and overwhelming expression of the wishes of that people; yet so intent am I upon securing the main proposition in this bill, to which I believe those people are entitled, that I have already made concessions in the bill itself by depriving the people of one Representative in the other House of Congress to which they are justly entitled under the law, and there are other rights to which I deem them justly entitled that I would sacrifice for the main proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator or the committee either have done themselves justice by bringing in here a bill that they are willing to cut half in two and take one-half of.

Mr. DAWES. Half a loaf is better than none.

Mr. MORGAN. I know it is to a mere politician, but I do not happen to be one.

Mr. LOGAN. You have no politics at all.

Mr. MORGAN. I have very good politics, but they do not control my judgment upon judicial questions.

Mr. DAWES. I thought the Senator said this was a political question.

Mr. MORGAN. I said it was made a political question in the Territory. I said just the reverse. The honorable Senator was not in when I had the honor to lay down my definition of what my views are.

The Senator from Indiana, in reply to my last suggestion, says—and I have no doubt he says candidly—that his great and earnest desire in all this business is that the people of Dakota shall have a State government. I do not believe that that Senator desires any more than I do that the people of Dakota shall have a State government. But he says that an overwhelming majority of the people there have indicated a desire to have this constitution. We have but one means that I know of of ascertaining what that overwhelming desire may be, and yet the Senator from Illinois informs us that there were 280,000 people in Southern Dakota in round figures, and that there were 57,000 votes there in the last election for Delegate.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] stated it at 54,000 in response to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which I think was nearly accurate.

Mr. MORGAN. But only 31,000, pro and con, voted in the south half of Dakota upon the question of the ratification of this constitution. It can not be possible that the Senate of the United States, looking at its laws upon the statute-book on the one hand and the power and influence of 31,000 voters in the Territory of Dakota on the other hand, can hold to the doctrine that the Senate of the United States is bound to give up the laws organizing that entire Territory and disregard the will of all the people of Dakota lying north of forty-six degrees of latitude at the behest and on the demand of merely 31,000 voters, 6,000 of whom and more voted against the constitution.

Here we are looking at our duty, for we have got a duty to perform, looking at the honorable duty that rests upon us, if not a sworn one, to maintain the laws of the United States in their integrity throughout the whole of our borders; we see this great Territory there with a population approximating a half million very closely; we see it divided asunder by 31,000 men in the southern half of it; we see it torn to pieces upon lines arbitrarily fixed by a set of men who profess to represent not the whole but a part, and we ask ourselves the question, Does that address itself to our judgment as Senators as something that we are obliged to receive as conclusive evidence of an overwhelming vote of a majority of the people, that they want that constitution, want these officers also, and want this whole thing, cut and dried, arranged to suit, carried through the Congress of the United States and into that exalted act of the recognition of a State in the American Union?

There is one peculiar thing about all these proceedings in Dakota. Gentlemen who are more familiar with the history of this matter than I am, gentlemen on the committee, have spoken in the Senate, and they have informed us that in no case at all have the people of Northern Dakota been consulted in regard to this matter. I do not mean that the members of the Legislature that passed this appropriation of $20,000 and organized the Huron convention all resided south of 46°, but I do mean that when you come to the question of the division of the Territory, as I am informed of the facts, that point about the division has never been submitted to the votes of the people of the northern part of the Territory.

I am not going into the reasons, the physical reasons or the reasons of convenience, which might have made it appropriate and best, or might not have made it appropriate and best, to submit this question to the people of North Dakota. I merely want to rest my position in regard to this subject upon the proposition that, as a member of Congress, I am compelled to regard the law of the United States as it relates to the Territory of Dakota as a unit and as affecting the whole body of the people; and if I could find that this Territorial Legislature had the right of doing anything in regard to the establishment of this Huron convention, I could not ever consent, as a judge upon the facts, to say that I was here giving attention to the voice of the people of the entire Territory of Dakota, this legal unit which we ourselves have established, when in fact no question in regard to the division of the Territory, no question in regard to the establishment of this constitution, no question in regard to these United States Senators or the Delegate in Congress or any of the balance of this array of officers has ever been submitted to the people north of the line of 46°.

Mr. President, this is a mere Cæsarian operation in bringing this State into the Union. These surgeons cut down into the very bowels of that commonwealth organized by the Congress of the United States, and they bring forth this young infant and ask us to cover it with the mantle of charity until it shall have time to overcome its disfigurement, to warm and nurture it in the bosom of the Government of the United States until it shall have growth enough to stand upon its own feet. It is an act of violence, an act of wrong, whether considered in reference to the law or considered in reference to the will of the people of Dakota.

Sir, I happen to have reports made to me personally by gentlemen who reside in North Dakota. They do not want this great commonwealth dissevered. There is a large body of people in that country who do not want a division at all, and I confess that my views of State policy have always accorded with that body of people. If I were a citizen of the Territory of Dakota to-day I would just as much object to the division of that Territory as the honorable Senator from Texas on my left would object to the division of the territory of Texas, though there is the right to make five States of it. The two Senators from that State understand as well as we do, and perhaps very much better, that the power of that great Commonwealth in taking care of the interests of her people is very greatly increased by the breadth and richness of its territory. Let me illustrate. Suppose that the little State of Delaware had taken into mind in the early days of this country that she would build the Erie Canal instead of New York. She would have built the Erie Canal to the border of Delaware and would have reached it in fifty miles or less from the point of starting. The great State of New York, however, bounded on one side by the ocean and on the other by the lakes, concluded that she would build the Erie Canal. She built it through her own territory. She had the power of a great State lying behind it, and with that wonderful work of internal improvement she did more to add to the wealth of her great commercial metropolis than by any other one act.

Why was New York able to build it? Because she had the water borders, and the distance, and the people, and the wealth, and the resources to build it. Suppose Dakota desires to build a railway from the Black Hills on the western boundary to connect with her southeastern boundary at Yankton. She wants to do it with State aid, with State influence, she wants to control it, and it is built without coming to Congress to ask Congress to control it, and she has got an empire through which the road lies, all under the control of one Legislature, and no question to be asked about whether Congress will consent to this or that. Compare the power of a great broad State, with its millions upon millions of acres, with that of a small State like Delaware or Rhode Island, and you can easily conceive, I think, that the people of these large States, with their local Legislatures, have very greatly the advantage over the people of the smaller States, and these are not unimportant affairs. Take the power of a great State, as Dakota would be, in the Union. It counts but two here in the Senate, but what does it count in the other House? A multitude.

What will be the power of Texas in the House of Representatives in the next thirty years to come? It will be greater perhaps than that of all the Gulf States east of the Mississippi River. In the House, that great tribunal of the people where taxes are voted, where appropriation bills originate, where the people come up through their Representatives fresh every two years to participate in the Government, there the power of a great State like New York or a great State like Texas is felt with an influence that no small State can possibly rival. Compare New York to-day with Rhode Island in the House of Representatives with her two Representatives and Delaware with her one Representative. What is the power of Delaware or Rhode Island in the House compared with that of New York, and who can wonder at the growth of New York in her ability to avail herself of the advantages of national legislation, and who can wonder that in speaking about future Presidents and all the policies of the Government we turn to New York instead of to Providence? And yet there might have been at Providence a city as large as New York if Rhode Island had extended all the way up from New York through New England, including Maine.

These are considerations that do not address themselves particularly to the Congress of the United States, but they would address themselves to me as a citizen of Dakota, and I assure you that citizens of Dakota living in the north part of that Territory are fully cognizant of them and appreciate them. The people of that Territory do not want it emasculated, and I deny the assumption here either that it is for the welfare of Dakota or that the people of that Territory wish to have their grand commonwealth cut to pieces and made into States of diminutive proportions.

Mr. President, I have gone through with all the facts that I desire to recite in support of my theory about this bill, which is, first, that it is not a bill coming from the people of Dakota; second, that it comes in violation of the laws of Congress; third, that it disrupts the Territory by violence that Congress in the charter of that Territory said should be inviolable until an act of Congress was passed; so that in regard to this particular Territory when you undertake to bring in a State out of a part of it, thereby making it necessary to divide the Territory, you must first get the consent of Congress. There is not a lawyer in the United States who would not advise his client so on a proposition of law of that kind. He would say, "I find in this act an inhibition upon the Territorial Legislature to change the boundaries or to provide for a change of boundaries; it shall not be a subject within their power in any sense; and I find an express declaration that Congress alone shall change the boundaries." Then if you come here with part of the Territory to be admitted as the State of Dakota, you must first produce an act of Congress showing that we have authorized a change in the boundaries; otherwise the act is in violation of law, it is contumacious. If accompanied with force, it would be rebellion; if also accompanied with a conspiracy to enforce it, it is treason against the Government of the United States to foist a government into authority without the consent of Congress first had and obtained in a Territory which Congress has said shall be inviolable except by its own consent.

Mr. President, in support of this view that I entertain and which concerns me more than everything else about this case, that we must act in accordance with law here, as judges we must decide whether the law has been complied with or whether it has been violated in this proposed admission of the State, I beg leave to read an extract from an opinion given by a great judge who will be recognized by some at least in the United States as very high authority. I mean the late Jeremiah S. Black. He says:

> Mr. Grote, the most learned and thoughtful of modern historians, has shown by divers examples that fidelity to the fundamental law—which he terms constitutional morality—is the one indispensable condition upon which the safety and success of every free government must depend.

He was speaking in regard to the fundamental or constitutional law of a Territory as well as of the United States.

> The high career of Athens from the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ to a period after the death of Pericles—the marvel and the admiration of all time—was plainly due to the faithful practice of this supreme virtue. It was this that made the steady Roman strong enough to shake the world. England observes not only the theories, but the minutest forms of her constitution when legislating for her own people, and that has given her domestic tranquillity and solid power at home; her shame and her misfortunes are all traceable to the disregard of it in dealing with colonies and outside dependencies. Constitutional morality was cherished and inculcated by our fathers in the early ages of the Republic as the great principle which should be the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and our safety abroad, and to the end that it might never be forgotten they imposed a solemn oath upon every legislator and every officer to keep it and observe it with religious care at all times and under all circumstances. In contrast with the self-imposed restraints of the American democracy, Grote mentions the French, a nation high in the scale of intelligence, but utterly destitute of attachment to any constitution or any form of government except as a matter of present convenience. You know what came of it—eleven revolutions in less than eighty years—a history filled with wrong and outrage, a people forever alternating between abject slavery and the license of ferocious crime.

It is as plain as the noonday sun that without constitutional morality every pretense of patriotism must be false and counterfeit. The man who says he loves his country, and yet strikes a fatal blow at the organic law upon which her life depends, shows his sincerity as Nero proved his filial affection when he killed his mother and mutilated her body.

A violation of constitutional law is not an offense which is ever made venial by the occasion. You can not do evil that good may come. The evil is there, and the good never comes.

No matter how unimportant the breach may seem, though small at first, it will widen like a crevasse in the Mississippi, until the whole stream of arbitrary power goes rushing through it. Besides, the grade of a crime is not measured by the extent of the particular mischief. Forgery is forgery, whether the sum obtained by it be great or small, and murder is not mitigated by showing that the victim was short of stature. It often happens that legislators, as well as other men, feel themselves hampered by such restrictions; but that does not authorize disregard of them. You can not break lawlessly over the Constitution because it confines you to limits inconveniently narrow.

I commend those doctrines as to the moral law of the Constitution and the moral duty of supporting it to the Senate.

What more has this bill got in it besides the admission of the State of Dakota and the admission of the officers elected to the Congress of the United States under the State of Dakota and other officers elected as it has said under that constitution? This bill has got after its twentieth section a provision for the organizing of a lacerated Territory, that the north half of that Territory after we snatch this State from it by this Cæsarian method, being the Territory of Dakota, shall have its name changed from Dakota to Lincoln; proposes to change its organization; proposes to give it a governor by itself and a Legislature by itself. The bill as presented from the Committee on Territories is a bill to admit a State into the Union, it being found necessary before that State can come into the Union that we shall by law reorganize a Territory, for surely it is not expected that we shall pass half this bill.

When we admitted Michigan, which is cited as an authority, or Colorado, or any other Territory into the Union, first of all the boundaries were prescribed by an act of Congress or by the consent of an act of Congress, and that commonwealth came in as a whole. I call it a commonwealth because it is a commonwealth, with power to do all things that are delegated to it under its charter, subject only to the revision of its legislative acts by the Congress of the United States. Here, then, is a State one-half of which this bill proposes shall be admitted out of a certain commonwealth. Suppose we stop right there and do no more. We disorganize and destroy a Territorial government in order to admit a State. The bill says, however, we shall reorganize that Territory. Then if we shall, it is because that is a necessary condition precedent to the admission of the State. What does that imply? What is the admission that comes from that state of facts? Congress, and Congress alone, can fix the boundaries, and when this Huron convention undertook to fix the boundaries, and the people of Southern Dakota to vote upon them, they were not even exercising the lawful right of petition, because they were petitioning in contumacy against the law.

Gentlemen speak of precedents. They say this State has been admitted without an enabling act, and that State has been admitted under certain peculiar circumstances. They say no State was ever formed out of one State of the Union, except during the time of civil rebellion, as occurred when the State of West Virginia was formed. Is that to be a precedent for the formation of States in time of peace hereafter? Can an act of Congress cut Pennsylvania in two by the consent of a certain body of men who may call themselves a legislature at Pittsburgh and haul one-half of that State into the Union by the ears, leaving the balance of it, from Harrisburg east, as the State of Pennsylvania? No, Mr. President, a bad precedent is better broken than followed. But the idea of arguing this case upon the precedents is utterly absurd—not to use any improper expression about the arguments of my colleagues on this floor—but it is absurd in itself, for the reason that there is no precedent for this case.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator, now that he has stated that—and I have tried several times to get a bill of particulars; we have had that general statement from the Senator from Missouri and others—give a bill of particulars in which it differs from other examples?

Mr. MORGAN. The mere fact of your starting to cut it in two by consent of one-half those people.

Mr. HARRISON. The same thing was done in the case of Iowa, as I showed, and California fixed its own boundaries.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; those Territories were never cut in two by the consent of one-half of their own people. They were not first cut in two by politicians and then ratified by Huron conventions. No, sir; that was an act of sovereignty of the whole people, to which we paid respect. There is no case like this of Dakota. There is no case which robs a Territory of one-half of its domain, and cuts out one-half the people from saying a word about it. Suppose there had been precedents, what Senator can content himself as a judge by following a precedent that he knows is a bad one, any more than a judge of the Supreme Court can content himself by following a precedent that he knows is a bad one? They decide what the law is, and so do we in a matter of this kind. The Supreme Court decided first that paper money should be made a legal tender. They took their decision back, and they decided that it could not be made a legal tender, and other judges, coming afterward, took that decision back and decided that it could be a legal tender. Each one of them was a valid decision, because coming from valid authority, but I suppose we could hardly take either of them as a precedent. That question remains open for the constitutional determination of every Senator on this floor whenever it arises, although there may be some judges in the land who are bound by it. So, sir, with us, we can set aside these precedents or disregard them at our will and pleasure, provided, in doing so, we are influenced by good conscience and sustained by good reason. That is the whole question.

I protest, Mr. President, that in this matter of admitting new States out of the territory yet remaining to us or out of the territory that we bought from Russia, which is yet really unorganized, or out of any territory that we may hereafter acquire, we shall not set the precedent of allowing the people in that territory to break down and disregard the laws of Congress in order that they may get a pretext for an organization to come here for the sake of admission. No, sir, let these States come in equal honor. When they get into the American Union one State is the equal of every other. So it was with the old thirteen; so it was with every sister that has come in. Let there be no question about it; no serious question as to whether the voice of the people has been actually ascertained, as to whether our laws have been violated in the manner of ascertaining it. Let us at least on our part feel that we have not broken the law in order to admit a State into the Union either for the gratification of our personal desires or our political ambition. Let them all come alike.

I want Dakota to come into this Union, and if that whole Territory presented this constitution that is here to-day as expressing the will of the people lawfully, without an array of officers elected by a party clique before the admission of the State, I would vote for her admission. I want her to come in before the first centennial anniversary of the American Constitution. I would like to see this State welcomed on that day, if you please. I would like to see Dakota prepared, under a bill that we shall enact, to adopt a constitution. I know she will adopt a good one—so that her good and brave people can come into this Union on the very day of the centennial anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. There is a beautiful fitness and aptitude in the thought to me. Three times thirteen is thirty-nine. We have thirty-eight States now. Let us admit Dakota. I should like to see it done on the last day of the centennial period, so that we could say to the world, Behold this array of States, these thirteen grandmothers, each with a daughter on either hand! They stand here to prove to all coming generations of men that this century has witnessed the most marvelous work of the human hand and human mind in the creation of free government by a free people. Three times thirteen, thirty-nine, will be accomplished when Dakota is in, and I will join hands with the honorable Senator, though the State might be ninety-nine one-hundredths Republican in politics.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to read a note from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for that purpose, of course.

Mr. BUTLER. This was not intended to be made public, but I think it is proper that it should go into the RECORD.

FEBRUARY 3, 1886.

DEAR BUTLER: As it seems uncertain when I can get out of bed, I write you as to a matter of some importance in the Dakota debate. I am suffering a good deal, but I will try to make it plain.

At the election for Congressional Delegate in November, 1884, Southern Dakota polled 57,915 votes. You will find exact vote in my speech in yesterday's RECORD—

I think perhaps he is mistaken about that; the number was 54,000.

In June, 1885, the vote for delegates to the constitutional convention was less than 12,000 (so Johnson informs me).

In November, 1885, the vote on the adoption of the constitution was about 31,000.

This shows the fact that capital-moving, prohibition, &c., increased the vote from 12,000 in June to 31,000 in November.

If the people were so anxious for this movement, why did only 12,000 come out in June? No election could be more important to the new movement; but there was no attention given to the thing by the people, and therefore Messrs. Moody & Co. invented the additional issues to bring out a big vote. Even then only about half the voters came to the polls.

Again, Mr. HARRISON says that out of 79,000 people in Iowa, 11,500 votes were cast. This would make two-thirds of the whole vote. At the ratio of 5 to 1 for 79,000 people would give about 16,000 votes, and 11,500 voted.

In Dakota only about half voted in November, 1885, and only one-fifth in June.

Do not fail to put this on record.

Truly,

G. G. VEST.

I should like before I take my seat, if it will not inconvenience the Senator from Indiana especially, to have an article read from a leading Republican paper in Dakota in reply to the article commented upon by the Senator from Illinois from the Charleston News and Courier, this bearing specially upon Dakota and that article being irrelevant to the question at issue.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that, by unanimous consent, it be put in the RECORD as part of the Senator's remarks. The other was not read.

Mr. BUTLER. I will retain it, then, until the Senator gets through to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection, if the Senator chooses, to have it read now. Let it go in the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER. I will, with the permission of the Senate, allow it to go in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

The article is as follows:

As to the Dakota Statehood movement, the Journal knows as well as we do that the Sioux Falls convention did not represent the people of Southern Dakota, nor one-tenth of them. The Journal knows as well as we do that not half of the voters in Southern Dakota voted on the question of adopting the constitution, and of that half a large percentage voted against it, notwithstanding that the capital was to be located at Sioux Falls, Huron, Mitchell, Pierre, Chamberlain, and Alexandria, and that a majority of the tickets read: "For the constitution, yes," and no "no." The Journal knows the facts as well as we do, and still it constantly, day after day, reiterates the stale falsehood that the people of Southern Dakota frantically demand admission under the Sioux Falls constitution. It is a solemn fact that the people of Southern Dakota demand nothing of the kind and never did, and the Journal ought to know it. Even the so-called Legislature which met at Huron a while ago refused to recognize Hugh J. Campbell, who is and has been acknowledged by all to be the father of the whole State movement in its present shape.

It would seem, the Journal thinks, Dakota means only Hugh J. Campbell, Frank Pettigrew, J. H. King, J. R. Gamble, and a few other noisy and ambitious politicians with their expectant followers, and this and these was all there was of the Sioux Falls convention, and the Journal knows it as well as we do and always has. It may be the thing to do, for the Journal, from a party standpoint, to deny the truth and clothe a fraud and humbug in flowing and attractive robes, but that paper should have more honor of itself, if it has no respect for the rank and file of the yeomen of this part of Dakota, than to use its great influence in misrepresenting the people of Southern Dakota.

This county had one delegate in the Sioux Falls convention, M. J. Shultz, and he got just 80 votes out of some 1,300 in the county, and he a State organizer and representing the people of this county! What was true here was true in nearly every county in Southern Dakota. In fact, one rich and populous county, Davison, was not represented at all in that convention. These being the facts, how does it comport with truth to claim 270,000 in Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel as shrieking for admission under the Sioux Falls constitution? The thing is so absurd as to be simply ridiculous.—The Dakota Republican, Thursday, January 14, 1886.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from Indiana to yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In view of the storm prevailing, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. Before that motion is put I desire to say that it is my purpose, if I can do so without injustice to any one, by maintaining our sitting a little longer than usual to-morrow, to ask the Senate to finish the consideration of this bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana gives notice that he will ask the Senate to conclude this bill to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under the rule, will lay before the House several executive communications.

INMATES OF SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the President of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home, recommending that the estates of inmates remaining unclaimed three years after the death of the owner shall escheat to the home, and asking legislation to that end; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home, recommending legislation fixing the charge for medical treatment of inmates of the Home at the Government Hospital at $8 per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION BY RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives calling for information as to what, if any, changes should be made in the law regulating the compensation to railroad companies for carrying the mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

UNITED STATES PENITENTIARY, BOISÉ CITY, IDAHO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, a letter from the Attorney-General recommending an appropriation of $25,000 to enlarge and improve the United States penitentiary at Boisé City, Idaho; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS OF CROW INDIANS, MONTANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation of $2,000 for completing the allotment of lands in severalty to the Crow Indians in Montana; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM-BOILERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam-Boilers, recommending a modification of the provisions of section 4435 Revised Statutes concerning the construction and arrangement of steam-boilers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MILITIA OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an abstract of the militia force of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

EMOLUMENTS OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an abstract of the emoluments of officers of customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STANDARD BALANCES, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosure, a letter from the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, recommending the passage of a joint resolution to authorize the Bureau of Weights and Measures to duplicate or repair injured, lost, or destroyed standard balances, weights, and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING.

The SPEAKER, in accordance with statute, also laid before the House a resolution of the House (with the amendments of the Senate), for printing and binding 25,000 extra copies of the President's annual message, with accompanying documents; and a resolution of the Senate for printing and binding 3,050 additional copies of the Compilation of Senate Election Cases, 1789–1886; which were referred to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARBOUR, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness in his family.

SIGNAL-SERVICE BUREAU.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to report back with an amendment the resolution which I send to the desk, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution, together with the amendment proposed by the committee, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas section 3678 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that all sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditures in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made and for no others; and

Whereas it is represented that said section was violated in this, namely: that certain moneys heretofore appropriated by Congress for the carrying on of the Signal Service Bureau have been misapplied: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be instructed to inquire whether the statute above referred to is now being obeyed, and whether or not it has heretofore been violated; and to report by bill or otherwise such measures as will secure its enforcement.

The amendment proposed by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the resolution add: "That the committee be empowered to send for persons and papers."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BLAND. I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged resolution of inquiry, on the adoption of which I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is it a report from a committee?

Mr. BLAND. It is submitted by the direction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, at the convention of the American Bankers' Association, held at Chicago, Ill., in the month of September, 1885, Mr. George S. Coe, a member of the executive council of said association, and the president of the American Exchange National Bank of New York City, made, in an address delivered before said convention, the following statements, namely:

"Under these peculiar circumstances [referring to assumed dangers resulting from the continued coinage of silver] the new Government came into power. It was at once confronted by the peculiar difficulties surrounding the Treasury Department. Like his predecessor, the President clearly appreciated the magnitude and imminence of the danger, and in the interim before the meeting of Congress he is taking as efficient steps as are practicable under the existing law to save the nation from being precipitated into the deep abyss of financial deterioration.

"His temporary expedient is both simple and safe. The law requires the Treasurer to purchase not less than $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion per month and coin it into dollars. But he is required to pay them out only when necessary.

"To avoid this necessity the Treasurer now confines his disbursements to strictly legal demands and refrains from monthly payments as hitherto of the funded debt.

"The surplus of revenue supplies requisite means not only to purchase the monthly sum of silver bullion required by law, but also to withdraw a sufficient amount of silver certificates issued upon previous purchases to overcome the excessive accumulations which so perplexed the prior administration.

"This will safely hold the situation until Congress shall convene.

"The temporary danger which existed until income thus overtook expenditures was satisfactorily arranged by concert with the clearing-house committee in New York, whose earnest efforts at that critical moment to preserve the gold standard were enlisted in behalf of the commercial community, which it is their function to specially represent." (Page 35 of published record of the proceedings of said convention.)

And whereas, near the close of the second session Forty-eighth Congress, to wit, on the 26th day of February, 1885, this House refused, by a decided vote, to consider a then pending proposition looking to suspension of the coinage of silver dollars: Therefore,

Be it resolved by this House, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether or not any such agreement or arrangement was effected by the management of the Treasury Department with the clearing-house committee in New York, or with any other association or person, as is alleged in the said address of Mr. Coe; and, if so, by what authority of law such arrangement was made and carried out.

And, further, to inform this House what amount of silver dollars was in the Treasury on the 4th day of March last unrepresented by outstanding certificates, and what amount of silver certificates was in circulation; what amount of such dollars is now in the Treasury unrepresented by outstanding certificates, and what amount of such certificates is now in circulation.

Also, what amount of silver dollars was in the Treasury on the 4th day of March last that could have been applied in the payment of the interest-bearing debt and other dues of the Government, and what amount of such dollars is now held in the Treasury that could be so applied; also, what amount of silver certificates is held in the Treasury that could be reissued; also, what amount of interest-bearing debt is now subject to call, and what policy is to be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues.

Mr. BLAND. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. Is there a report accompanying this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It has none. The rule requires every proposition reported to be accompanied by a report in writing. The gentleman from Illinois inquires whether there is a report.

Mr. BLAND. I will introduce a report in writing at a later period in the day. I did not suppose that objection would be made. A report in writing can be made in a few moments.

Mr. MORRISON. It is probably not essential, but it may lead to a better understanding of the resolutions. I ask this delay that I may see what there is in this resolution. While the report is being prepared I can examine and ascertain what is proposed or asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point there is no report in writing accompanying this resolution under the rule, and the matter will be withdrawn for the present.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIANS.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Indian Affairs for present consideration certain amendments to joint resolution (H. Res. 91) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue certain unexpended balance for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana."

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 25, 1886.

Resolved, That the joint resolution from the House of Representatives (H. Res. 91) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue certain unexpended balance for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana," be passed with the following amendments:

In line 1 strike out the word "Resolved" and insert "Be it enacted."

In line 10, strike out the word "live" and insert "life."

In line 14 strike out the word "Tounge" and insert the word "Tongue."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue certain unexpended balance for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this report?

Mr. MILLS. I should like to know how long it will take.

Mr. NELSON. I ask consent to make a brief explanation.

Mr. BURROWS. Have these amendments been considered by the committee?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir; they have been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I make the report by the direction of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendments?

Mr. BEACH. I do not object; but I would like to know how these orthographical errors occurred in the bill, so we may have legislation on that point if necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed, there being no objection.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to make a brief explanation. This is the joint resolution of the House which passed some two weeks ago, to authorize the Government to issue $12,000 of an Indian appropriation of last year for the immediate relief of the Cheyenne Indians. It was in the form of a joint resolution, prepared by the Indian Office, and sent up here for our action. The resolution passed this House, went over to the other body, from whence it comes back with these amendments.

Now, these amendments, Mr. Speaker, are mere corrections of misspelling of words. In one instance the word "life" is spelled "live," and in the other case the word "Tongue" is spelled "Tounge." [Laughter.]

The third amendment is to change the joint resolution into a bill.

This is a case of great urgency. Already the attention of Congress has been called to the matter twice. It does seem to me that these amendments evince a hypercritical spirit, something like that attributed to Nero, who it is said fiddled while Rome was burning.

The amendment changing the joint resolution into the form of an act was wholly uncalled-for, as there are abundant precedents showing the original form was the proper one. However, in view of the necessities of the case, the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House report in favor of concurrence in all of the Senate amendments.

Mr. BEACH. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution, but what I would like to be informed about is how these errors in spelling occurred. Were the mistakes made by the person who draughted the resolution, or were they the mistakes of the engrossing clerk?

Mr. NELSON. To answer the gentleman's questions specifically, I will remark that so far as I am advised the mistakes occurred on the part of the engrossing clerk of the House.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to indulge me for a moment or two in a brief statement in explanation of this matter, which I feel ought to be made in justice, if not to the House, at least to the Committee on Indian Affairs. So urgently does the situation of these Indians appeal for assistance that the President of the United States deemed the matter of sufficient importance in the early days of the present session of Congress to make it the subject of a special message. Subsequently thereto the chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs received a communication from the Secretary of the Interior earnestly asking speedy action and early legislation on the subject.

In response to these executive calls, the House a few days ago, on motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], passed the legislation recommended by the President in the form of a joint resolution. The Senate in its dignified conservatism, I suppose, or perhaps its superior parliamentary wisdom, has returned the joint resolution to the House with an amendment changing the proposed legislation from the form of a joint resolution into that of a bill; or, to be more specific, an amendment striking out the words "Be it resolved," &c., and substituting the words "Be it enacted." Now, sir, while I shall ask the House, for reasons to be stated before taking my seat, to concur in this amendment of the Senate, yet I do it being fully aware of the fact that if the House were to adhere strictly to its practice in former years it would reject the amendment, because I am advised that there is but one instance on record where the House has accepted a Senate amendment changing a joint resolution into the form of a bill, and that in the closing hours of a dying Congress when contest over the matter would be fruitless.

I wish, however, to make this statement, which I think the circumstances authorize, if they do not require. There was no occasion for this Senate amendment, so far as the object of the proposed legislation is concerned. That object could be accomplished either by a joint resolution or by a bill, and just as effectually in one way as the other. The only significance of the amendment, if it has any significance, is an intimation that the House in its proceedings on this matter has disregarded established forms of legislation. And now, Mr. Speaker, to that intimation, no matter whence it comes, indeed I am constrained to enter a respectful but an emphatic denial; and in proof of this denial I desire to place on record some pertinent facts. In the general appropriation bill for the Indian service for the present fiscal year appears this clause:

To supply food and other necessities of life in cases of distress among the Indians not having treaty funds, arising from emergencies not foreseen or otherwise provided for, to be used at the discretion of the President, $50,000.

Now the manifest purpose of this clause was to enable the Indian

Office to feed and otherwise suitably care for such Indians as might be overtaken by distress from any unforeseen cause, and for whose relief no annuities or other Indian funds were available.

The Indians embraced in this resolution, it is true, have small annuities, but they are wholly exhausted, and the Indians, from unexpected emergencies not otherwise provided for, are in destitution and want. These Indians, therefore, are clearly within the spirit of the appropriation, although they would perhaps be excluded from its benefits by a strict construction of the language in which the appropriation is made.

While I will not assert that the legislation now proposed is, strictly speaking, the construction of a prior act of Congress, yet I do say that its sole purpose is to bring under the operation of a former law of Congress a class of persons who are manifestly indisputably within its spirit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am justified by long usage, traceable through numberless accordant precedents—I am thus fully justified in the assertion, which I now make, that to accomplish just such objects as that contemplated in the proposed legislation is the legitimate, appropriate office of a joint resolution, the action of the Senate of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

And one word further, Mr. Speaker. While it is true, while in my judgment the House is clearly right in this matter and the Senate clearly wrong, I can not shut my eyes to the fact that the difference relates to a mere matter of form, not touching even remotely the substance of the thing to be effected. For this reason, and believing that the House of Representatives can not afford in the face of a grave emergency to fight over a quibble, I join the gentleman from Minnesota in asking that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be a separate vote demanded the question will be taken upon concurring in all of the amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. NELSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to say, sir, at the outset that I realize the importance of a strict adherence to the rules, so that order and decorum may be preserved in the House, and I shall not knowingly transgress them.

The rules for the government of the House are complex and difficult to be understood, especially by new members. Indeed, sir, that is not at all remarkable, when I have found during my short membership of the House that even the best parliamentarians differ widely as to their interpretation; and therefore, before proceeding to state my question of personal privilege, and in order that I may proceed strictly under the rules, I desire to submit to the Chair a parliamentary inquiry, which is: Believing that the dignity and integrity of the proceedings of the House, and that my reputation and conduct individually and in my representative capacity, are affected by the statements made in the House by one of its members concerning a Senator from the State of Virginia and as to myself; and as the name of the senior Senator from my State was twice called by a member of the House in debate a few days ago, and the effort was made, as I believe, in this House to cast reproach upon him; and as my own name was not only called upon the floor of the House, but a threat made against me; and also, as I have seen it publicly stated, that my name has been called and threats made against me before one of the committees of the House by one of its members concerning my action as a Representative in Congress; and as it was stated on the floor of the House that a twice-wounded and a twice-promoted-for-gallantry Union soldier was removed from office at the dictation of the senior Senator from Virginia and another official was dismissed for "beastly intoxication," I desire, Mr. Speaker, to be informed whether or not under the operation of the question of personal privilege I can show to the House, as I propose to do by official communications of recent date from high officials under the present Administration, by the public records and otherwise, that each and all of the said statements made by the member from Virginia are not true?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's parliamentary inquiry is a very comprehensive one [laughter], and can not be specifically answered. The Chair can only state in response to the gentleman's question what the rule of the House is as the Chair understands it. If any statement has been made upon the floor or elsewhere, the Chair thinks, which reflects upon the gentleman individually in his representative capacity, or if any threat has been made upon the floor of the House or in a committee of the House by a member or by any one else which was intended to put him in fear of personal violence, or a threat which was intended to influence the action of the gentleman in any way as a Representative, a question of privilege would be presented. But the gentleman has not informed the Chair what the statement is which was made on the floor of the House, nor what the supposed threat was which he says he has been informed was made before a committee of the House. Under these circumstances the Chair can not say whether there is a question of personal privilege presented or not.

Mr. BRADY. Is it in order, then, to ask unanimous consent to make a statement?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BRADY. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. HERBERT. I object.

Mr. REED, of Maine. You want to stifle the facts.

Mr. HERBERT. And you are very anxious to make speeches in anticipation of the facts that will come out; for you know the report of the Secretary will show the facts to be against you.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of order. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I do not think gentlemen will take me off my feet when I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama should address the Speaker and not address the gentleman from Maine in the second person.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that the colloquy between the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Alabama was not in order.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am directed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to report the following resolution, and ask its passage by the House, in order to proper legislation on the subject.

R. P. BLAND,
Chairman Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, which has already been read.

Mr. REED, of Maine. When did the committee make this report?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLAND. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not intend to offer any objection to the adoption of this preamble and resolution, but I want to say I think it is entirely too general, if not objectionable, in asking what is to be the future policy of the Treasury Department as to the payment of the public debt or other of its duties under the law? I presume that policy will depend entirely on the condition of the Treasury and the requirements of the law.

Mr. BLAND. I have only this to reply. We know what the policy has been heretofore, from the time that Mr. Sherman was Secretary of the Treasury up till now; and it is a proper matter for legislation on the part of Congress to determine whether that policy shall be changed or not; and it is proper to inquire from the Treasury Department whether it is to be pursued in the future or not before we legislate upon it. I therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LONG. I ask to have the resolution again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HATCH. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BEACH. I object to the resolution being read again.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, which is equivalent to an objection. Unless some gentleman demands separate votes on the preamble and the resolution the question will be taken on them as a whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I was not able to follow very closely the reading of the resolution so as to ascertain what right exists as to having separate votes on the different parts of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The preamble can be voted on separately according to the rules of practice.

Mr. RANDALL. The object I have in view would be accomplished either by separate votes on the different parts of the resolution or by a motion to strike out that part which asks as to the policy of the Administration. The policy of the Administration can best be learned by its acts.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. The previous question having been ordered, the resolution is not subject to amendments.

The SPEAKER. The inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was whether there would be an opportunity to take separate votes on the different parts of the resolution. The Chair is now examining the resolution to ascertain whether that would be in order or not.

Mr. RANDALL. I was not able to follow the reading closely enough to learn that.

The SPEAKER. The first vote is upon the adoption of the resolution without the preamble, and then on the preamble if a separate vote should be demanded; and the Chair has been examining the resolution to see if it contained more than one proposition on which separate votes could be had.

Mr. HEWITT. Would it be in order after the previous question has been ordered, as it has been, to move to recommit the resolution with instructions?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. HEWITT. Then I move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with instructions to strike out that portion of it which asks the Secretary of the Treasury to define the policy of the Administration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with instructions to report it back, omitting that portion which calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury to state the policy of the Department.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is in order to have that part of the resolution read, so that we may know exactly what we are voting upon.

The SPEAKER. It will be read. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] will please reduce his instructions to writing.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The preamble and resolution were read and then were withdrawn. After other business they were again presented, but only the resolution was in fact read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. My inquiry is whether it is now in order to ask that the preamble be again read, and if so I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that any gentleman has a right to have the entire proposition read after it has been reported back from the committee. The Clerk will read the preamble and resolution in full.

The Clerk again read the preamble and resolution.

Mr. HEWITT. Now, Mr. Speaker, my motion is to recommit the resolution to the committee with instructions to strike out at its close all after the words "now subject to call."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] will please suspend a moment. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to state that the committee had reported some amendment to the resolution which was referred to the committee by the House. If that be so, the gentleman will please indicate the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I have reported the resolution in its present form as a substitute for the original proposition.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, then, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] reports the resolution in the form just read as a substitute for the original resolution referred to the committee.

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, can the original proposition be now read?

The SPEAKER. The whole of it has been read together. There is nothing in the paper sent to the Clerk's desk to show what was the original proposition and what are the amendments. The Clerk will now report the amendment as proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words: "The Treasury Department assumes to virtually suspend the coinage of silver by hoarding the money in the Treasury after it is coined" and insert the words "such arrangement was made and carried out."

Strike out, at the close of the resolution, the words "and what policy is to be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and other public dues" and insert "and will the same policy be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues in the future as in the past."

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with instructions to strike out certain words.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the Clerk read the words proposed to be struck out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] moves to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with instructions to report the same back with the portion stricken out which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, at the close of the resolution, the following words:
"And will the same policy be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues, in the future as in the past."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to recommit the resolution to the committee with instructions to report the same back with the words which have just been read stricken out.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the yeas and nays upon this.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, there was so much confusion prevailing in this part of the House when the amendment was being read that it was not understood. If in order, I ask that it be again reported.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made every effort to secure order on the floor. The difficulty rests with gentlemen themselves.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 90, nays 169, not voting 64; as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out these words: "And what policy is to be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues" and insert the following: "And will the same policy be pursued in the payment of silver thereon and on other public dues in the future as in the past."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

SINKING FUND.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred resolution No. 5, respectfully report the accompanying resolution in relation to amount of payments applied to sinking fund during the fiscal year 1885 and recommend its adoption, it being the substance of the resolution submitted by Hon. J. B. WEAVER January 18, 1886:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the House the total amount applied to the sinking fund between June 30, 1884, and July 1, 1885, and under what dates and in what several amounts the same was applied.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR COMMITTEES, ETC.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your Committee on Printing beg leave to report that, owing to the increase in the number of the committees of the House, there are not now distributed a sufficient number of CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS to supply each committee with a copy thereof. Your committee recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to order from the Public Printer one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the present Congress for each of the standing and select committees of the House and the Chaplain of the House.

The SPEAKER. This is not a privileged report under the rules of the House, but if there be no objection it will be received.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall not object, but the members of the committees do not read the RECORD, and these will only lumber up the committee-rooms.

Mr. HOLMAN. Each member of the House has now two copies.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The resolution is offered at the request of several committees of the House, who state that they are not furnished with the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COBB. I understand this resolution provides for furnishing each select and standing committee of the House with a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes; that is it.

Mr. SPRINGER. It has been rendered necessary by the creation of new committees at this session, which are not furnished with copies of the RECORD.

Mr. COBB. Does it refer to bound copies of the RECORD?

Mr. BARKSDALE. No; but to the current daily issue of the RECORD.

Mr. COBB. My committee has a RECORD every day.

Mr. SPRINGER. But other committees do not receive the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOCKERY. I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution be so amended as to provide only for supplying RECORDS to the committees which do not now receive them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to amend the resolution so that it will read "to furnish a sufficient number of copies of the RECORD to supply each committee with one copy;" that is, standing and select committees of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 2.

So the resolution was adopted.

The bill (H. R. 1042) was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of standing and select committees for reports. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at half past 2 o'clock, and the call rests with the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry before that hour begins. It is a parliamentary inquiry for the purpose of securing from the Speaker the construction of one of the recent rules adopted with reference to the time to be occupied in the morning by any committee. In case that a committee shall be called near the close of the hour, is that committee entitled simply to the remainder of the time, whether it may be five or ten minutes of the hour, or will it be entitled at the next time the committee is called to complete its hour and have another hour in addition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, under the rule, the committee is entitled to have its measures considered for some time during two morning hours; that is to say, it is entitled to have its measures considered at some time during each one of two morning hours; and if it happens to be called five or three minutes before the close of the hour the Chair is of the opinion that it would have on the next day when the committee was called for this class of business, under the rule, only one more hour to complete it; after which, if the business should not be concluded, it would go on the Calendar as unfinished business.

Mr. DINGLEY. I supposed that would be the construction, but I desired to have a ruling of the Chair upon the question.

ABOLITION OF CERTAIN SHIPPING DUTIES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill under consideration when the Committee on Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests was last called.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill the title of which has been read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I had commenced an explanation of the provisions of this bill when the House was last in committee for its consideration, and had substantially completed my explanation of the first section, which is its most important feature. I desire to add to that explanation that the provision of the bill providing that the abolition of certain fees for services to vessels should not disturb the compensation of collectors and other officers of customs who are paid in whole or in part by fees does not in any manner change either the method of ascertaining their present compensation or the amount of it. The same provisions of law and the same safeguards will continue until Congress shall determine specifically a stated compensation or salary in each particular case; so that the question of safeguards will not enter into the consideration of this bill. All that is practically done in this respect is to abolish these fees so far as they are a charge upon vessels of the United States, and leave to the Treasury Department the determination of the compensation of each officer so far as these fees affect it as now.

I may add that the compensation of inspectors of steam-vessels is now fixed by law and the compensation of shipping commissioners by the Secretary of the Treasury. I doubt not that in due time the Committee on Expenditures of the Treasury Department, to whom has been referred a plan submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a fixed salary for each officer of customs, will make a report which will be favorably considered by the House. It is of course improper to attempt to go into the question of determining salaries without investigation in the consideration of a bill dealing solely with the merchant marine.

The second section provides that shipping commissioners shall have authority, in case they are requested by a master of a vessel engaged in the coastwise trade or in the trade with the West Indies, Mexico, Central America, or British North America, to ship seamen in the same manner that they now ship seamen on vessels engaged in other trades. The shipping act of 1872 excluded from its operations vessels in trade with British North America, the West Indies, Mexico, and Central America; and, notwithstanding shipping commissioners have, for convenience, been accustomed to ship seamen for these trades, yet it is clearly without authority of law. But the convenience of the transaction is so great that the Treasury Department asks that a distinct recognition of this authority may be made by law; and this section has been reported for that purpose.

Section 3 amends what is known as the Cox section of the shipping act of 1884, which prohibited the payment of advance wages and the allotment of wages yet to be earned, except to relatives. The same difficulties have been experienced in enforcing the measure that I pointed out at the time would probably be found, and persons interested have made suggestions as to the need of modifications. The committee have adopted the same modifications that were suggested by Mr. Cox himself in the Forty-eighth Congress, and which, in the form of a bill, was unanimously passed by the House but did not become a law for want of time. The provisions then suggested have been substantially incorporated into the bill which is now presented for the consideration of the committee.

Another modification of the Cox section of the shipping act of 1884 is incorporated in this bill, so as to apply the same penalty to a foreign vessel for violating that act as is applied to a vessel of the United States. That section as it now stands leaves it uncertain whether the penalty is to be simply the refusal of a clearance to a foreign vessel violating the act, or is to be that and also a penalty. A refusal of a clearance is a penalty of doubtful propriety, and for this reason is stricken out and a uniform penalty substituted.

Section 4 extends all the limited liability laws relating to sea-going vessels, so as to include vessels in the inland trade, except barges, canal-boats, and lighters, which have always been excepted from the limited liability provisions of our shipping laws. Originally these limited liability laws did not extend to shipping on the great lakes, but several years ago the courts extended these laws to these lakes on the ground that their navigation was as perilous as that of the ocean.

The reasons for extending the provisions of the limited liability laws to vessels on the inland waters of the United States are substantially these: First, that such vessels encounter to a certain degree substantially the same perils of navigation, although of a different character, that are encountered by sea-going vessels; secondly, that they go beyond the control of the owner in the trips which they make; and thirdly, that the liability laws as they exist discriminate against ownership in inland vessels, particularly steamers upon our rivers.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does this bill give any relief from the fees paid by owners of inland vessels?

Mr. DINGLEY. The first section gives relief from fees as regards vessels engaged in the inland, coastwise, and foreign trade. It covers the whole merchant marine of the United States.

Sections 5, 6, and 7 of this bill simply change the penalties for certain minor violations of the laws relating to shipping. The penalty now provided for certain minor violations is forfeiture of the vessel. The penalty is changed here to a small fine. These changes are all recommended by the Treasury Department.

Section 8 imposes a penalty on a foreign vessel for transporting passengers between two ports of the United States. This has been rendered necessary by a construction which has been given to our laws imposing a penalty on foreign vessels for transporting merchandise between ports of the United States. Merchandise has been construed by the Department to cover simply goods transported. In view of the construction which has been given, there seems to be no penalty provided for the conveyance of passengers between ports of the United States. There have been found no difficulties in this respect except with Canadian vessels on the lakes, which have been accustomed during the summer season to come to the American side and convey excursion parties. And it has been suggested by the Treasury Department that the penalty which is provided by this section will be sufficient to break up the practice.

Section 9 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may remit fines and penalties imposed under the provisions of the four preceding sections when he finds that the offense has been unintentional. As these fines are all imposed by collectors of customs, it seems appropriate that there should be an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 10 provides that the provisions of law allowing a drawback of 75 cents per ton on bituminous coal imported for the use of vessels shall be construed to apply solely to American vessels, as was originally intended when the act was passed.

Mr. HEWITT. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the fact that he used the expression "bituminous coal imported." The language in the section is, "Bituminous coal used for fuel."

Mr. DINGLEY. I will propose an amendment, covering this point, at the proper time. Section 11 amends section 14 of the shipping act of 1884, relating to the tonnage tax, which is equivalent to the light-house dues of other countries. The act of 1884, changing the mode of collecting the tonnage tax upon vessels, offered to all countries in North and Central America and the West Indies, that if they would abolish the tonnage tax, light-house dues, and other equivalent taxes on American vessels the United States would abolish the tonnage tax as to vessels engaged in trade between the ports of that country and the ports of the United States. This bill amends that act so as to extend this offer to all countries which do not discriminate against American vessels.

Mr. HEWITT. There has been an international representation on the subject, has there not?

Mr. DINGLEY. There has been a representation made to the Government of the United States by Portugal and certain other nations with which we have treaties containing what is known as "the favored-nation clause," that the act of 1884, by force of this treaty provision, entitled the vessels of these countries, in the direct trade with the United States, to the same privilege as vessels trading between the United States and the countries of North America. But I may add, the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion showing very clearly that that act was not, even in the respect complained of, a violation of the "favored-nation clause," as it gave equal privileges to the vessels of all nations in the same trade; and the Secretary of State, in a communication made to Congress, is in accord with the opinion of the Attorney-General. At the same time, to avoid all chances of complaint, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that the act of 1884 should be amended so as to make this tender to all nations, and it is so provided in the amendment made by section 11.

The last section of the bill simply requires the President to make known his tender to all foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, I have made a very brief explanation of the provisions of the bill, and if any gentleman desires to inquire further I shall be happy to answer so far as I am able.

Mr. COLE. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Maine whether the third section provides that the seamen shall have two months' advance of wages.

Mr. DINGLEY. It does not provide that seamen shall have that; but if there is an agreement between the master of the vessel and the seamen for an allotment of not exceeding two months' wages for just debts for board and clothing it shall be recognized by the shipping commissioner.

Mr. STORM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question in regard to the eleventh section. I ask the gentleman what will be the difference in the revenues of the Government between the tonnage rate of 30 cents and the tonnage rate of 3 cents per ton? The eleventh section reads:

That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum, imposed prior to July 1, 1884, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed, &c.

What difference will that make in the revenues?

Mr. DINGLEY. I may say to the gentleman that no change is made by this bill in the rate of tonnage tax previously imposed. This section of the bill recites the whole section of the act of 1884, but makes no change in its provisions except tendering the offer of an abolition of tonnage taxes to all nations that do not discriminate against us, if they will abolish similar charges on our vessels.

Mr. STORM. Then it makes no difference in the revenues?

Mr. DINGLEY. None, except so far as other countries may accept our tender.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] a question about this bill. Certain fees are now collected by customs officers and other officers from vessels. Those fees this bill proposes to abolish. Can the gentleman inform us what is the amount of such fees per annum?

Mr. DINGLEY. The amount is estimated at about $300,000—somewhere between three hundred thousand and three hundred and fifty thousand, as I stated in my remarks the other day.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then, as I understand it, this $300,000 which is now paid by the vessels is to be paid hereafter out of the Treasury. In other words, the vessels are to be relieved from that burden.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Why is that?

Mr. DINGLEY. On that point I will read the reasons presented in the report of the Treasury Department for the abolition of these dues. The report says:

The revenue collected from these sources—

The sources specified in this bill—

while inconsiderable in aggregate amount, is regarded as a burden from which the ship-owners should be relieved, and it is recommended to abolish the fees entirely. Most of the services performed by the Government officers for which fees are collected are not especially beneficial to the ship-owner, but are for the protection of the revenue, or of the public, or of the seamen, or for statistical purposes, and there is no good reason why the ship-owners should bear the burden.

That is the reason given by the Treasury Department why these fees should be abolished.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then this change is not made at the request of the ship-owners?

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course ship-owners desire that this should be done. They feel that these are burdens that ought not to be put upon them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But the change, I understand, is proposed wholly for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. The services for which these fees are now collected being required for the protection of the revenue, and for the protection of the public interest, it is proper that the Government pay for such services of its own officers, and not impose their compensation as a charge upon vessels.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the gentleman's statement, it would amount to this, that the Government, in order to protect the people, find it necessary to collect certain fees or dues and to collect them from ship-owners. Now the Government officers are for the protection of the public——

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] let me say a word just here?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, there is a broader view of this question, which I have no doubt influenced the action of the committee, and if brought to the attention of the House will doubtless influence its action also. It is a fact that we have been losing our carrying trade, and it is desirable to recover it in order that our American seamen may be kept in training and employment.

The English Government, in securing to so large an extent as it has secured the carrying trade of the world, has removed nearly all kinds of burdens from its ships. I can see from this bill that the committee which reported it is moving in the same direction, and while this measure will not accomplish all that is desirable or necessary, it will do something toward regaining our ocean carrying trade and our ship-building trade.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, these dues are chiefly collected from our internal commerce. I will ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to state whether that is the fact, or whether they are collected from foreign vessels.

Mr. DINGLEY. I may say, Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House that this bill does not propose the abolition of fees upon any foreign vessel. It relates solely to vessels of the United States.

Mr. KING. It relates to American vessels on rivers as well as those engaged in the coastwise trade.

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. In section 3, line 6, I observe that it is proposed to amend the act of 1884 by inserting this provision:

Or to an original creditor in liquidation of any just debt for board or clothing which he may have contracted prior to engagement.

That amendment refers, I suppose, to seamen, boarding-houses, and shipping agents.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is known as the Cox section of the act of 1884 prohibited the payment of advance wages and also an allotment of wages yet to be earned to any person, except a relative of the seaman, his wife, his children, his mother, or some other relative. It has been found, or it has been represented, that there are many cases where seamen have contracted just debts for board and clothing, and petitions have come in that the law may be amended so as to permit such allotments to extend to any just debt for board or clothing, the matter to be under the supervision of the shipping commissioner. This provision was unanimously passed in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. HEWITT. It is only for one month's pay, anyhow.

Mr. DINGLEY. One month for board and one month for clothing.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. As I understand, the Cox amendment sought to protect the seamen against the "sharks."

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir; and that is the object of this amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, does this proposition so modify that provision as to place the seaman in the hands of that gang? If it does, I am against it. The ordinary seaman and his interests do not appear much on this floor; but the interests of these boarding-house "sharks" and of the shipping men can generally be made to appear. Now, I ask my friend—and I know he will give us accurate information—to state what the effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be upon the sailor in a boarding-house or out of it, shipping for a voyage?

Mr. DINGLEY. My own judgment about the matter, as expressed when this measure was originally under consideration in the Forty-eighth Congress, was that while the object of all these restrictions is a highly commendable one, yet practically it is exceedingly difficult to protect any man who does not show a disposition to protect himself; still it has been the policy of all nations to throw as much protection as possible around the seaman on the ground that he is a ward of the Government, so to speak—not having a permanent home, and therefore not being in a position to protect his interests as the ordinary citizen can.

The Cox section, so called, of the act of 1884, prohibited absolutely the payment of advance wages under any circumstances. But in practice it has been found, as it also has been found in Great Britain, where there has been similar legislation, practically impossible to enforce a law drawn thus closely. Hence, in accordance with petitions not only from owners of vessels but also petitions from seamen themselves, the committee have broadened out the objects for which an advancement of wages or an allotment of wages to be earned may be made, namely, that it shall be confined to a just debt for the board of a seaman or a just debt for clothing actually furnished, and that it shall be limited to one month's advance pay with reference to clothing and one month's pay with reference to board.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. How much was it under the Cox amendment?

Mr. DINGLEY. That provision did not allow advance wages at all. That provision has proved almost a dead-letter, because of the impracticability of enforcing it; and therefore, after conference, the various parties have thought that by broadening out in this direction the law might be enforced and might prove, what it is not now, some protection to the seaman.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. One other question. Section 8, I suppose, would apply simply to ports in the United States and passengers carried between such ports.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir; the gentleman is right as to that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But suppose there was a port, for instance, below Niagara Falls, this provision would not apply as between the American shore and the other?

Mr. DINGLEY. The provision in this section has reference to a vessel going from one port of the United States to another port. Other provisions of law apply to such a case as that supposed by the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are no other questions I will yield the floor. But as this bill covers a large number of minor details which can be better considered when the committee come to consider the bill by sections under the five-minute rule, my hope is, in view of the short time we have for its consideration to-day, that the general debate may be as brief as possible, in order that the committee may take up the bill in detail.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to state to the gentleman that I have an amendment to offer to the fourth section.

Mr. DINGLEY. When we reach that section the amendment can be offered.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we now proceed to consider this bill by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, general debate on the bill will be closed and the Committee of the Whole will proceed to consider the bill by sections.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after July 1, 1886, no fees shall be charged or collected by collectors or other officers of customs, or by inspectors of steam-vessels or shipping commissioners, for the following services to vessels of the United States, to wit: measurement of tonnage and certifying the same; issuing of license or granting of certificate of registry, record, or enrollment, including all indorsements on the same and bond and oath; indorsement of change of master; certifying and receiving manifest, including master's oath, and granting permits; granting certificate of payment of tonnage dues; recording bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, or the discharge of such mortgage or hypothecation; furnishing certificate of title; furnishing the crew-list, including bond; certificate of protection to seamen; bill of health; shipping or discharging of seamen, as provided by title 53 of the Revised Statutes and section 2 of this act; apprenticing boys to the merchant service; inspecting, examining, and licensing steam-vessels, including inspection certificate and copies thereof, and licensing of master, engineer, pilot, or mate of a vessel; and all provisions of laws authorizing or requiring the collection of fees for such services are repealed, such repeal to take effect July 1, 1886. Collectors or other officers of customs, inspectors of steam-vessels, and shipping commissioners who are paid wholly or partly by fees shall make a detailed report of such services and the fees provided by law to the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as that officer may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow said officers such compensation for said services as each would have received prior to the passage of this act: Provided, That such services have, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, been necessarily rendered.

Mr. DINGLEY. By direction of the committee I offer an amendment to make clear what otherwise might be subject to some misapprehension.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by striking out, in line 12, the words "granting permits," and inserting the word "permit;" also, insert after the word "permit" the words "granting permit to vessel licensed for the fisheries to touch and trade."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of making a brief statement I move to amend by striking out the last word. A number of my constituents are large owners of vessels, and are interested in being relieved from as many charges as possible. Perhaps, therefore, if I had regard simply to the interests of that portion of my constituents I ought not to call the attention of the House to what I think is a stretch of legislation possibly beyond what the House may intend in this first section.

Some of the services included in this section are purely governmental—the discharge of governmental functions, looking to the interest of the Government, and not to the benefit of the ship-owner. In those cases, it seems to me, the tax should not be imposed upon the ship, but the Government should assume it. But other things purely for the benefit of the ship-owner himself; for example, recording bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, or the discharge of such mortgage or hypothecation, furnishing certificate of title, certificate of protection to seamen, bill of health, inspecting, examining, and licensing steam-vessels, including inspection certificate—these are services merely for the benefit of the ship-owner. They correspond exactly to the services rendered by the county clerk or the register or recorder who records a deed or mortgage or who puts a satisfaction piece or release on record. Those are proper charges upon the ship and ship-owner beyond all doubt.

Now, the only excuse for removing these charges is that you want to help the shipping trade, which is now in distress. It is perfectly true, Mr. Speaker, the shipping interest is in distress. It needs and ought to have relief, and so far as this House can give such relief I shall be glad to extend it. But it seems we ought not to proceed without making a distinction between these two classes of things. This relief is given to the coasting trade and to American vessels—I should say to American vessels, and those only engaged in the coasting or inland trade, of which they have a monopoly. There is therefore no ground upon which relief should be given to this American interest except it may be the general desire to afford the shipping interest a chance. I share in that as much as anybody. I do not propose to offer any amendment to strike out these items, but I simply want the House to proceed with a full knowledge of the nature of the legislation they propose to enact.

Mr. DUNN. Let me ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. Does he not think that a bill of health is a service for the public security—that it is more for the public benefit than for the benefit of the owner of the vessel?

Mr. HEWITT. On the contrary, if I owned a vessel, or was responsible for its voyage, I should want to be dead sure before it went out to sea that every man on it was in condition to do his full duty, first, because he was a well man; and secondly, because if a contagious disease broke out on shipboard it would ruin the voyage beyond recovery.

Mr. DUNN. No doubt every ship-owner would have that interest, but the public is far more deeply concerned than any individual owner against the spread and dissemination of contagious diseases.

Mr. HEWITT. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that while his criticism as to the bill of health, if I had a doubt on the subject, might be sufficient, it does not, nevertheless, apply to recording bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecations, or conveyances, or the discharge of such mortgages or hypothecations.

Mr. DUNN. On the contrary, I think it does, because the Government, for the purpose of keeping the control of all vessels as to registration, requires to have the control of all these papers. It requires to know all the time where the vessel is sent and what for. It is required, therefore, that the bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance, or the discharge of such mortgage or hypothecation, shall be made in the nearest customs district.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HEWITT. I will merely say that will apply to every case of conveyance of private property. The public is interested in one way, but the individual is interested much more.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman having charge of the bill whether the provisions of section 4834 of the Revised Statutes are covered by the language of the twenty-second line?

Mr. DINGLEY. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, I will say it does cover the charges imposed on vessels of the United States unless their abolition would work the abolition of similar charges upon foreign vessels. The design of the committee is to sweep away all these charges on vessels of the United States where it can be done without relieving foreign vessels from the same charges.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move a formal amendment with the view of saying a few words in reference to this bill. As my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] has said he has some concern with reference to the bill, permit me to say that I also have. But my concern goes in a contrary direction. While I am thankful to the committee for the bill given us, I can not but recognize the great reforms that lie beyond that many of us would like immediately to reach. This bill aids to some extent. It helps a little, and goes a short distance in the right direction of raising the burdens upon our shipping; but there are so many burdens beyond that ought not to be on our shipping interests that I have no hesitancy in saying that those situated as I am only accept the bill as a limited movement in the right direction. I deem it my duty in the interests of a large class of my fellow-citizens to support this bill. I only wish that it went further in removing the embarrassments which rest upon and hamper our trade.

Mr. MILLS. But other bills will be coming on in the same direction.

Mr. PARKER. I trust the gentleman will assist in sending us other bills from the committee to remove obstructions to trade, some of which oppress the lake and river trade and ought to be done away with.

When I see that a single tow of a half-dozen barges coming across the St. Lawrence River to bring freight from Canada to New York is compelled to pay a tax of $2.50 on every barge to the consular office at the port of shipment as often as the tow may come across—sometimes being four or five times a week—I understand that there is something wrong in our shipping laws which makes such a tax possible.

Also, Mr. Chairman, when I see the wreckers of Canada allowed to go in to our northern rivers and lakes where an American vessel may be wrecked and assume the privileges and benefits of removing freights and raising the wreck in our waters while aid to American vessels by American wreckers is prohibited in Canadian waters; when we see an American vessel, wrecked in Canadian waters, even though convenient to our ports or shores, prohibited from receiving aid from an American wrecker, but must be allowed to go to pieces, with the destruction of the vessel and cargo, while waiting till assistance can be obtained from a Canadian wrecker, I submit that when such a state of things as this exists we must recognize the fact that some reform is needed in our shipping laws. And so I might call attention to many other provisions in which the law is in need of amendment.

The theory of our legislation seems to have been to tax ships and tax commerce and tax business wherever it could be reached in these relations, while upon the other side of our northern rivers and the great lakes Canada, following the course of Great Britain in this direction, has made its shipping practically free. Their charges are nothing, and the government supports in every possible way the ship-building and the ship-owning interests of Canada. Therefore, while I am ready and glad to support this bill, and will not interfere to embarrass it in any manner, I yet hope that the committee having these matters in charge will so continue their labors as to give further assistance in regard to this important branch of our national interests.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, in response to my friend from New York, I wish simply to say that the committee have other measures looking in the direction he suggests for the relief suggested, and they hope to be able to report some of them at an early day. I am entirely of the opinion that all of these unnecessary charges and burdens should be removed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in regard to this section of the bill, and move to strike out the last word for that purpose. As I understand from the reading of the bill these fees for "recording of bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecation, or conveyance, or the discharge of such mortgage or hypothecation," &c., are repealed. I wish to ask if there is any record required of that mortgage? In other words, this would be like a bill of sale of a farm, to be recorded in the county clerk's office, as I understand?

Now I do not exactly see why the United States Government should pay for that service. That is a little different in principle from lifting a burden upon shipping. That is a fee which stands to the owner as a benefit accruing to him, and has relation to his title. I have a general idea that when a demand is made here—and I am glad of it—to free shipping from burdens and commerce from burdens, we should treat property in ships, vessel property, as a vehicle of commerce, and place it upon the same footing that we would treat real estate, horses, and everything in the shape of property in the United States. And I wish to say that I will go as far as any one else in seeking to restore the carrying trade of the United States by American vessels. I do not propose in doing that to place a class of property upon the sea at an advantage over other property in the United States, and while removing the burden from shipping undertake to give it privileges which you will not give to other classes of property.

I do not see why the tax-payer of the United States shall, through the United States Treasury, pay for the record of a bill of sale of a vessel. It seems to me that is carrying it a little bit too far; and I have got a general idea that there are several of that class of things here.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas the question, Of what interest or benefit is it to the owner of a vessel to have a bill of sale or mortgage recorded?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I should think about the same interest as it would be to the man who sold a horse.

Mr. DUNN. Just about the same; and that is not necessary or required by the law of any State or country.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The gentleman's point, then, is that the whole thing is useless?

Mr. DUNN. The public law requires that record to be made in the nearest customs district for public purposes—for the purposes of the Government in following the vessel and its ownership.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I supposed that it was required for the reason that the vessel is movable property. It is not simply for the benefit of the Government. The man who takes the mortgage has an interest.

Mr. DUNN. It has nothing to do with mortgages.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. We are encouraging by these provisions transportation by water in the interior of the country.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And likewise the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; and we are thereby providing a safety-valve against railroad monopoly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion. I want to give to our foreign commerce and our home commerce, wherever it can be, relief from monopoly; but I do not want to give to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company or the Morgan Steamship Company down South or any other concern relief from a burden on property under the guise of free commerce which would not be given to any other class of property in the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last three words, for the purpose of saying a word or two. I live on the Mississippi River, and am interested in encouraging the shipping interests on the Mississippi River. When the waters of the Mississippi River are open the cost of transportation to my people to the East and the West drops very perceptibly, and our shipping interests in the interior need just as much encouragment as the other shipping interests do. I appeal to my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], who stands on this transportation question like a head-light in front of an engine, to tumble gracefully with us on this occasion and help to relieve water-transportation interest and encourage it in order that it may successfully compete with the iron horse that treads so ruthlessly on the interests of the people.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I agree with the desire expressed by my friend from Iowa, and would like to see the navigation of the Mississippi and the commerce on it facilitated. But I have not forgotten the time when it was attempted to run a line of barges from Kansas City to New Orleans. Mr. Gould's railroads put on a barge line at lower rates and ran out the other line.

Where there is a possibility of securing lower rates I am for it, but I do not want under that guise to be led into doing a lot of things which I otherwise would not do. My difficulty about this provision and some others is to know how many mice are in there.

Mr. HEWITT. I have an amendment which I desire to propose to the pending section, and I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will see his way clear to accept it. The only question I suppose is whether it would be germane or not.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT. I send the amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the section the following:

"Provided further, That only one consular certificate shall be required on any one tow of canal-boats or barges when trading between any port of the United States and any port in the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. HEWITT. That amendment would prove a great benefit.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the point of order. I want to say, personally I have no objection to the object which the amendment has in view. But it was the intention of the committee to reserve that and a number of other subjects relating to navigation on the lakes for another bill. If, however, there is no other member of the committee who objects, I will not object.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not object to this. It is very important.

Mr. DINGLEY. The committee will make no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit another amendment to go in at the end of the section following that which has just been adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no collector or other officer of customs, inspector, or shipping commissioner shall receive from the Treasury of the United States any salary, fees, or other compensation for services connected with his office above enumerated a greater sum in the aggregate than $6,000 per annum, except the collector of the port of New York, whose salary and compensation in the aggregate shall not exceed $12,000 per annum.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see how the amendment can be subject to a point of order, inasmuch as it is a question of compensation. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the fact that I introduced this proposition without being exactly certain about it; but on examining the various statutes touching compensation of collectors of customs and other officers connected with that service I find there is so much confusion in them that I am very apprehensive by these general provisions we are running the risk of very materially increasing the compensation of public officers connected with that branch of the service.

Twelve thousand dollars is the present salary of the collector of the port of New York, and that I would leave as it is. The salaries of two or three others—I think the salary of the collector of Philadelphia and possibly that of the collector of New Orleans—exceed $6,000. But it is generally admitted, and has been so reported to the House repeatedly by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the matter of the compensation of the officers in this branch of the public service is in a very unsatisfactory condition. Many of the salaries are extravagantly high, and if we should make these salaries correspond in some degree to the compensation paid by the Government to like officers in other branches of the service, probably $6,000 would be about the proper amount. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that I offer this amendment merely out of abundant caution, for I would regret very much, and so should we all, in the present condition of the service, if a year hence it should be found that we had inadvertently opened up opportunities for increasing the compensation of these officers beyond what they are now paid.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that there can not be any increase of salaries under this bill. It is impossible.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not certain that there can be, but I desire to guard against any such chance.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that as there are only a few minutes of the hour now remaining and he can discuss his amendment at another time, I propose to move that the committee rise.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order on the amendment proposed, I move that the committee now rise. Before the question is put, however, I desire to give notice that, this bill going now on the Calendar as unfinished business, I shall move at the first opportunity that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the unfinished business. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to withhold his motion for a moment in order that I may offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman can offer his amendment and have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, offered the following amendment:

Strike out of section 4, after the word "navigation," at the end of line 11 and beginning of line 12, the words "but shall not apply to any" and insert the words "including canal-boats, barges, and lighters."

The motion of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration a bill to abolish certain fees for official services, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up a tax-bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means a question before the vote is taken upon his motion. I do not understand that he desires to dispose of the bill at this time.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I desire to dispose of this bill at the earliest possible moment; but I understand that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] wishes to speak to the bill, and that will consume the balance of the day, so that it will not be disposed of to-day.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMMOND). The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering revenue bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in lieu of the existing law taxing certain fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits and exempting from taxation certain other parts of a gallon, all fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits produced on or after the 1st day of May, 1886, shall be taxed; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall thereafter assess, monthly, against each distiller, owner, or person having them in possession, a tax of 90 cents upon each proof-gallon, or wine-gallon when below proof, which the fractional parts of a gallon contained in casks or packages of distilled spirits produced by such distiller on or after said 1st day of May, 1886, and withdrawn from distillery warehouse or from special bonded warehouse upon payment of tax, or upon which the tax has otherwise become payable, during the preceding month, may aggregate, together with the proportionate tax upon any final fraction of a gallon beyond the number of full gallons aggregated; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make such regulations and prescribe such warehousing bonds as are needful to carry this law into effect. All assessments made under this act shall be a lien on all distilled spirits on the distillery premises, the distillery used for distilling the same, the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, the tract of land whereon the said distillery is located, and any building thereon, from the time such assessment is made until the same shall have been paid.

Mr. MILLS. I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add: "And all taxes imposed by this act shall be paid in standard silver coin."

[Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, in 1878 Congress passed a law authorizing the limited coinage of standard silver. Ever since that time there has been a constant demand for its repeal. Within the last twelve months associations of national bankers, cotton exchanges, and boards of trade have been very active and zealous in their efforts to create a public sentiment that would compel Congress to retrace its steps. They charge that the country is perilously near the edge of a great financial crisis; that if we continue to coin silver as we have been doing, gold will leave the country, and that we will be flooded with the cheap silver of foreign countries. They charge that the dollar which we are coining under the act of February 28, 1878, is a dishonest dollar, and that every creditor is defrauded who is compelled to accept it. These are grave charges, and I propose to consider them in the order in which I have stated them.

Is it true that gold will leave the country if we continue to coin silver? It was Patrick Henry who said that he had but one lamp by which his feet were guided, and that was the lamp of experience.

I propose to test these propositions by the rays of light that are thrown from that lamp on our pathway.

It was predicted by all the friends of scarce money when we were passing this law that gold would begin at once to leave the country and that the cheap silver of foreign countries would begin to be unloaded on us. The law has been in force eight years; what has the lamp of experience revealed? The very first year after the law was passed we imported more gold than we exported. We have coined $218,000,000 of silver dollars, and gold has continued to come to us, and during the eight years we have imported largely more than we have exported. When this law was passed we had $218,000,000 of gold coin in the country; we have now about $600,000,000. Does that look like gold was leaving us? It is a curious fact that from the opening of the mines of California to the passage of the law of 1878 we were constantly exporting more gold than we were importing, and since that time we have been constantly importing more than we have been exporting. During the last eight years we have coined more gold than our mines produced. It was not the cheap silver but the cheap gold that has been dumped upon us. I do not wish any one to understand me as contending that the importation of gold was in any way caused by the limited coinage of silver. I assert nothing of the kind. Gold is directed in its movement by the same inflexible laws that direct the movement of cotton, wheat, and corn. It always goes from the lowest to the highest market for itself, and from the highest to the lowest market for the commodity for which it is to be exchanged. We see that gold has been coming from foreign countries, and we know that it came to buy wheat and cotton and provisions, because they were cheaper here than they were in Europe. The lamp of experience shows that gold found it profitable to come from Europe and buy our cheap agricultural products. We still have it, and will retain it until prices are lower in other countries, and then it will begin its movement from us until its withdrawal from our markets makes prices low again, and then it will stop its outward movement. Just in proportion as it leaves the country, and its volume grows smaller prices will decrease, and a level of prices between this and other countries will be reached, when its exodus will cease. So that there is no danger that gold will leave this country.

But for what will gold leave us? When we look over the whole field of our trade what article is it for which gold will go abroad? Will it go for silver? Why, silver is dearer in Europe than it is here. Every kind of silver is higher in Europe, higher in India, higher in every country on the earth than it is here, whether it is coined silver or manufactured silver or bullion silver. Then it can not go for silver. It can not go to Europe to buy something that is higher there than here and bring it here to be sold at a loss. What will it go for? Will it go for cotton? We ship about two hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of cotton every year. We produce a surplus of cotton, and it can be bought cheaper here than in Europe. Gold will not go abroad for cotton; it will not go abroad for wheat; it will not go for petroleum; it will not go for provisions.

Then for what will it go? It will certainly not go as a gift. Our gold-owners are not so philanthropic as to give away $600,000,000 in gold. If they send it away they must have something in exchange for it, and I want some of the alarmists to tell me what gold is going for. It can only go for such articles as are produced at a less cost in other countries than here, such as coffee, tea, sugar, and manufactures. We import seven or eight hundred millions of such commodities, but does gold go to pay for them? It never has, and it never will. Why? Because we pay for them with commodities which they want, and which we produce cheaper than they do. They can not eat gold nor wear it, and if they had all our gold they would send it to us for bread and meat, as they did in 1879 and 1880. We pay for all our imports with the commodities we export, and then have a surplus of a hundred or more millions, which we apply to our foreign debt. There is no evidence and none can be produced to show that gold will leave this country as a consequence of silver coinage, and the history of the last eight years demonstrates the truth of that proposition.

Now, the next question is, will we be flooded with the cheap silver of other countries? Are we to be buried in a sepulcher of this bright and beautiful metal? Suppose the silver of other countries were all sent to us. Would it be a curse instead of a blessing? If money is a curse, why is all the world struggling to get it. Now, I am going to demonstrate to you that this prediction is as groundless as the other. Silver is higher in Europe than it is here, and can only come here at a loss. Last year the annual average value of a gold dollar in silver bullion in New York was 451.9 grains of fine silver. That makes 1 ounce of fine gold equal in value to 19½ ounces of fine silver. There is in round numbers three billion dollars' worth of coined silver in the world. It is coined in different countries at different ratios. In France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, Greece, and Spain it is coined at 15½ ounces of silver equal to 1 ounce of gold. In England, 14.28 to 1; in Portugal, 14.9 to 1; in the Scandinavian states, 14.88 to 1; in Austria-Hungary, 15.3 to 1; in Russia and India, 15 to 1. All this silver is legal tender and fully invested with debt-paying power. In some countries it is limited tender, in others full tender, but in all it is money, and the relative amount as fixed by the coinage laws of the several countries will buy as much, exchange as much, and pay as much as the equivalent in gold. In Germany and the Latin states 15½ ounces of silver will pay as much and buy as much as 1 ounce of gold. In Russia and India 15 ounces of silver will buy and pay as much as 1 ounce of gold, and so with all the rest. In each one of these countries silver is money, and has the monetary value conferred on it by law, but when it leaves the jurisdiction of the government that issues it and invests it with monetary functions, it leaves its monetary value behind it and becomes a mere commodity. Does any one deny this?

The Secretary of the Treasury is required by law to fix the value of all foreign coins, and that value is determined in silver-standard countries by the value in open market of the metal contained in the coin, and not according to the monetary value given to the coin by the law of the country that makes it. The florin of Austria is worth at home 48 cents in gold, but it is only worth here 37 cents. The rupee of India is worth 47 cents at home, but it is only worth 35 cents here. The yen in Japan is worth 99 cents; it is worth only 81 cents here. Within the jurisdiction of the country that coins it silver has a value given it by law, but when it gets beyond the protection of that government it loses that value and takes only such value as is accorded it on the open market of the world. France has a stock of silver worth in gold at home $553,000,000. If she should withdraw that silver and send it here for sale it would be worth $401,000,000; she would lose $152,000,000.

Belgium has a stock of silver worth $54,000,000 at home and $40,000,000 here. She would lose $14,000,000. Italy, Switzerland, Greece, and Spain, coining at the same relative value, would lose $24,000,000. Austria would lose $18,000,000, and India would lose $285,000,000. Has any nation ever embarked in such an enterprise? And yet we are told that all these countries are going to withdraw all their silver and dump it on us, to the incalculable injury of our people, and at a loss to themselves of more than $550,000,000. They are so anxious to take advantage of our stupidity that they will withdraw all the silver from circulation where every 15½ ounces is worth 1 ounce of gold and bring it here and sell 19½ ounces for 1 of gold and lose 4 ounces of silver in every 1 of gold. India is the greatest of all the silver-owning countries. She is to withdraw her $1,300,000,000 and dump it down on us at 19½ ounces of silver for 1 of gold, when 15 ounces of silver at home will buy 1 ounce of gold; and she is going to do all this at a loss of $285,000,000. Now, is not that proposition perfectly absurd? [Applause.]

You must remember that of the great stock of silver in the world the great body of it is coin. The mints are the great consumers of silver and there is no place where we can get any large amount of silver unless we extract it from the circulation of other countries. Now I have proved, I think, conclusively that silver can not be withdrawn from other countries and brought here. What has been our experience in the last eight years? All the time we have been threatened with the silver deluge. When we began to coin silver in 1878 we had $65,000,000 of silver coins in the country. We have coined since then $218,000,000 of silver dollars and $10,000,000 of fractional coins and ought to have now $293,000,000 of silver coins. The report of the Director of the Mint shows that we had in the country on the 1st day of January, 1886, $293,293,873.

We have just got what we have coined for our own use, and while we have only coined what we were permitted to do, and having a large surplus, the product of our mines, we have been constantly exporting more than we have imported. The lamp of experience has played sad havoc with the predictions of the prophets. Experience shows that gold is higher here and silver is higher in other countries. Twenty-three and twenty-two one-hundredths grains of gold will buy 451.09 grains of silver here; it will only buy 359.91 grains in Germany and the Latin states, 326.93 grains in Portugal, 345.51 grains in the Scandinavian states, 355.26 in Austria, 348.30 in Russia, and 331.58 in England. Our gold dollar, the equivalent in value of 451.09 grains of silver, is worth 100 cents here; it is worth 79.8 cents in Germany and the Latin states, 72.5 cents in Portugal, 76.5 cents in the Scandinavian states, 78.7 cents in Austria-Hungary, 77.2 cents in Russia, and 73.5 cents in England.

Gold will purchase more silver here than in any of these countries, and silver will purchase more gold there than it will here; therefore gold will not go there to exchange for silver and silver will not come here to exchange for gold—451.09 grains of silver, which is worth $1 here, is worth by the laws of Germany, France, Belgium, Italy, Greece, Switzerland, and the Netherlands $1.25, in Russia $1.30, Scandinavian states $1.30, Portugal $1.38, Austria-Hungary $1.27, and England $1.36. It is evident from these figures, which I have from official sources, that we may repress our alarms about the exodus of gold and the silver-dumping business.

It may be contended that there is a large stock of silver not coined that may be dumped upon us. My reply is that it is in manufactures and more valuable than the coin; and if the coin can not be imported on account of its value neither can the manufactures of silver. Every day coined silver is melted down in this and other countries to be worked up in manufactures. That would not be done if the manufactures were not more valuable than the coin. When that is done the highest skilled labor is put upon it and its value is in proportion to the amount of that labor. A silver cup or pitcher or spoon or watch is worth five times as much as the metal contained in it. A silver cup worth ten, fifteen, or twenty dollars, if melted down would not perhaps contain fine silver equal in weight to one dollar. Now, that silver is not going to come here to be coined. A blind man can see that.

Now what other silver is to come? There is some silver bullion. The last year's product is estimated at its coinage value at $115,000,000; $45,000,000 is estimated annually must go into the arts. That leaves $70,000,000 for the coinage of the world. India has taken on an average about $20,000,000 per annum for the last twenty years, and if none of the other countries took any we could coin $50,000,000 and keep it at par with gold. But every year there is some silver coined by other peoples. There was $90,000,000 coined in 1884, of which $28,000,000 was ours. But if all the mints in the world were closed but ours, we could coin the world's product and keep it at par with gold as long as the two metals are produced in proportions so nearly of the same value. The production of the two metals have kept near each other for centuries; they are still near each other. The last year's product of gold was $95,000,000, while silver was $115,000,000; but gold, in the circulation of the world, is yet $300,000,000 more than silver. Besides, the demand for the consumption of both metals in the arts is annually increasing.

The annual consumption of gold in the arts is estimated at $75,000,000 and silver at $45,000,000. If silver is driven from circulation we have to depend upon the residue of $20,000,000 of gold to keep the world's circulation abreast of the enormous annual production of the world's labor. If all of both metals were coined the supply would not be too great. There is no reason why silver should not be kept at par with gold here unless the production of one of the metals should materially decrease, and then they could be kept at par by changing the ratio. If silver and gold are at par now in their coinage value while gold exceeds silver in the circulation $300,000,000, why should they not be at par if silver exceed gold by that amount?

We can never be flooded with silver bullion from any country because it is cheaper here than elsewhere. Of the annual product of the world in 1884 of $115,000,000, the United States, Mexico, and Bolivia produced more than $100,000,000; and after consuming what they wanted for home purposes they exported the balance to hunt higher markets. Now, I ask, where is the cheap silver to come from that is threatening us with a financial crisis? It is not in the world.

The next is that our dollar is a dishonest dollar; that it is an 83-cent dollar, that it is a clipped dollar. I heard it called on this floor eight years ago in the discussion of this question by all of these bad names, and yet by the authority of the laws of the United States it is invested with a monetary function just the same as the gold dollar.

Now, if there is anybody in this House or outside of it who believes in his heart that it is an 83-cent dollar, if he will advertise that he will supply all that are wanted at 83 cents and sell them for gold dollars at 100 cents, he will soon see demonstrated the truth of the old aphorism, "The fool and his money soon part company."

Why, sir, if the Secretary of the Treasury should advertise in the New York papers to-day that he will sell all the silver dollars in the Treasury at 98 cents on the dollar, there would be a rush in New York by the gold men to get to the trains and come to Washington to exchange their gold dollars for the silver and make the profit of 2 per cent. This would be $2,000,000 profit on $100,000,000. The silver dollar goes all over this country from one man's pocket to another without question. It performs the same functions, it pays the same debts, and will buy the same commodities that a gold dollar will. It will discharge, within the jurisdiction of the United States, every solitary function which can be performed by the gold dollar or by any other dollar issued or protected by the authority of the Government of the United States. Why? Simply because it is a legal tender in payment of debts; it is a dollar clothed with monetary functions. In that case additional value is given to it from the fact that every creditor is bound to take it when it is tendered to him in payment of his debt. Now, sir, if it be true that our silver dollar is overvalued and that it is only worth 83 cents, why is it that in 1853, when we coined our fractional silver at 347.13 fine grains of silver in two half-dollar pieces when the standard dollar was 371¼ grains, we never heard that they were dishonest? I say why was not some outcry raised by all of these people who are protesting against smirching the honor of our country in supporting what they say is a dishonest dollar? Why is it that for twenty-five or thirty years this fraudulent coin has been allowed to go all over the country discharging all debts, paying all obligations on a par with gold, passing from pocket to pocket, and yet there never has been a doubt or a suspicion raised by any one as to its character?

Why, sir, within the last few months the national bankers, the men from whose offices this accusation has come, in their patriotic devotion to the Government of the United States, finding the Government, as they said, on the perilous edge of ruin and bankruptcy, tendered $6,000,000 of gold from their vaults, and stipulated with the Government of the United States that they should be paid in the fractional coins. Do you suppose these gentlemen would have made any such agreement if they had supposed they would have lost by it? These fractional coins in bullion value are worth 77 cents on the dollar; they would have lost 23 cents on every dollar. Do you suppose that patriotic as they are, philanthropic as they are, with all the good motives that animated their bosoms, they would have come to a rich Government like this and offered to make an exchange of six millions in gold for six millions of fractional silver when it involved them in a loss of one and one-quarter millions of dollars? They did not do it. They knew perfectly well that silver dollars performed the same functions as gold and that they would not lose a cent by it.

Why is it that the creditor class of France have not complained that 371¼ grains of silver in the French coins are only worth their bullion value of 79.8 cents instead of their money value of 103.1 cents? Why have they not demanded that silver enough should be put in to make the bullion value equal to their money value? But there never has been a whisper of that kind in France. The same is the case in Belgium, Spain, Portugal, in all the countries of continental Europe, and in North and South America.

Look even at England, conspicuous as the creditor country of the whole world, conspicuous for her devotion to the creditor class that constitutes her aristocracy and that supports her throne. The whole policy of that state has been for years to build up by every conceivable measure the aristocratical element in her society. And yet they never have learned up to this day that their silver coins, worth only 74 cents in the dollar, according to their bullion value, are swindling the people of that country out of 26 cents on the dollar.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, the silver dollar has a monetary value that is placed on it by law. How? The law opens a new market for the silver. Everything in trade by an unerring law of political economy takes value in proportion to the uses to which it may be applied. If there was no demand for silver by the mints its value would be determined by the demand for consumption in the arts. But when there is in addition to that a large demand for consumption in coinage, then the increased demand increases the price; and if the Government would consume the whole product and say to the holder of the bullion, "I will give you $1 in silver for every 371¼ grains of silver," it fixes the value of silver and prescribes the functions it is to perform. When the Government takes the silver from the holder and coins it and gives it back to him it adds to it 17 cents more in value than it had before. In all transactions in the United States and within the jurisdiction of our laws the silver dollar is the equal of the gold dollar.

What difference does it make to the creditor or the debtor whether the silver has 480 or 380 or 280 grains in it when it is a legal tender? When the debtor tenders it in payment of his debt, the creditor is bound to accept it; and if he refuses, and enters suit and obtains judgment, when the sheriff comes with the execution to sell he will be stopped and compelled at last to accept the tender. The money confronts him and he is bound to take it, and that is the end of it. It cancels every debt where it is tendered, and that is what makes it money. And yet Wall street tells us and the people of the United States that there is but one honest dollar—that which is coined in the proportion of 1 ounce of gold to 19½ ounces of silver. There is no government on this earth that ever coined silver and gold at that ratio; and, sad as it is, according to their standard there never was an honest dollar. But it is some comfort to know that as we put more silver in our dollar than any people in Europe we come nearer being honest than they do.

But I admit when a debt has to be paid to a foreign creditor that if it is paid in silver coin it must be paid at its bullion value. Our coins when they go beyond the boundaries of our Government go as commodities, not as money. If such a payment should be made in silver coin it would be at a loss of 17 cents on every dollar. But he will not do that, but do as we did during the suspension of specie payment. He will buy silver bullion or wheat or cotton or provisions and ship them and draw on his consignee. But that is not a perfect condition of our circulation. The perfect condition of our money is when the monetary value of the coin is equivalent to the commercial value, and we ought to come to that. Well, how are we to do it? We are certainly not going to do it by stopping the coinage of silver. It was the stopping of the coinage of silver and depriving silver of its market that made it depreciate and gold appreciate. Now, a great many of our friends say that the difference between silver and gold is all to be attributed to the appreciation of gold. Our friends on the other side say that all the difference is to be attributed to the depreciation of silver. The truth is the difference is equally divided between the two, according to the economic principle that everything takes its value in proportion to the demand that is made on it or the uses to which it is applied. When the mints were shut down on silver there was no demand for silver but in the arts. Silver then ceased to occupy a certain field of circulation in the world. It left that field unoccupied and there was increased demand for gold to take its place. Then the two metals parted, diverging from a point where they were on terms of equality until they got down to the point of difference at which they are to-day, which is about 17 cents on our dollar, one-half of which may be attributed to the appreciation of gold and one-half to the depreciation of silver. But it is a strange sort of philosophy which teaches us that in order to bring back the desired equality we must stop the coinage of silver. That is like telling a man when there is something the matter with one of his legs that the proper way to restore it is to cut off that leg and "peg" about as well as he can on the other, and that perhaps after a while, by some miracle—for nothing short of a miracle can produce the result—his leg will grow out again. It is like saying to a man when one of his eyes is diseased that he ought not to cure the disease and restore the ailing eye to the same condition as the other, but that the proper thing to do is to jab it out, with the idea that may be some of these days a miracle will be wrought—that somebody will come along and touch the eye and relume it again.

The way to bring the monetary value of gold and silver together is to restore the market to silver. Give silver free coinage. Throw open to it all the mints of the world. If you were to do that to-day silver would be at a premium, as it was in 1873 when Germany and other powers of Europe closed their mints against it. But, Mr. Chairman, there is this other difficulty in the way. If we go on and coin at the rate of 16 to 1, as we are doing now, what is going to be our condition when these foreign governments open their mints to silver at 15½ for 1? The fact is, we have never been a double-standard country, much as it has been talked about on this floor and elsewhere. The United States has been a single-standard country, but laboring all the time under the delusion that it was a double-standard country. Why? Because we have been doing from 1792 to the present time just what we are doing now; coining these two metals at relative values different from that adopted by the commercial nations of the world.

In 1792 we started coining at 15 to 1. Gold and silver were then coined at 15½ to 1 in Europe; and the result was that we had no gold. This was a silver-standard country up to 1834. In that year we tried to restore gold, and it is one of the singular things in history—and some great philosophers tell us that history repeats itself—it is one of the singular things that the double-standard people in those days were opposed by the same classes who are opposing silver to-day, and they called Benton and his friends who wanted to bring the gold back to this country "gold-bugs," just as we are now called, because we are trying to restore silver, "silver lunatics." Then we went on and changed the relative value of the two metals form 15 to 1 to 16 to 1; we jumped right over the space that divided the metals on one side to an equidistant position on the other side. What was the result? All the silver left the country. There was no standard silver in this country in 1853, and then the Government debased the fractional coin and brought it down to 347 grains of fine silver to the dollar instead of 371¼ grains. Then there were no silver dollars coined.

The silver was all passing out of the country because it was at a premium of 4 cents on the dollar in Europe. Then we were a gold-standard country with a subsidiary silver coinage of halves, quarters, and dimes. From 1853 to 1873 we coined only $60,000,000 of this fractional coinage, while our mines turned out over two hundred millions of silver. If we had not stopped the coinage, but had granted free coinage to all the silver at 14.95, it would have driven out all the gold again; for if 15 to 1 drove out the gold from 1792 to 1834, certainly 14.95 to 1 would have driven it out still faster. So, in order to keep some silver in the country, we limited the coinage, to a small amount, as we have it to-day; and during the twenty years between 1853 and 1873 we coined only sixty millions of fractional silver coinage, while the free coinage of gold amounted to seven hundred millions.

Now we are refusing to learn anything from all this history; and we have already coined 218,000,000 of these standard silver dollars. What is to become of these when the mints of foreign countries are thrown open—when, for instance, Germany opens her mints? And there is a powerful upheaval in Germany to-day, which means that the government must bow in submission to the will of the German people. When Germany extorted a thousand millions in gold from France she thought she would take up all her silver coin and put herself on a gold standard with that amount of gold in her vaults. She proceeded to sell some of her silver, and was carrying out her cherished object; but she was forced by the German people to put back silver into circulation and reinvest it with its legal-tender quality at the rate of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold. But that has not proven satisfactory to the German people. To-day, in their parliament, they are demanding of their government to restore silver to its full monetary functions, as they had it before 1873. It is only a question of time when the people are going to be stronger than all these aristocratic governments that are placing their heels on their necks. There is a depth of suffering which, when reached, will arm the down-trodden with superhuman power. They will rise in their might and shake the fabrics of government from turret to foundation-stone, and make their rulers come back to the old doctrine of our fathers—a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." [Applause.]

When Germany throws open her mints, France and her Latin confederates will follow; then what is going to become of the dollars of our fathers which we have almost wept over during the last seven or eight years? They will all be gathered up by these bankers, just as they gathered up the fractional currency under the law we passed in 1878 which compelled the Treasury of the United States to redeem coin. They have collected $28,000,000 of the fractional coin and sent it into the Treasury and taken gold in place of it. And now that it is in the Treasury it can not pay the national debt; it can not take the bottom from under their banks; and it gives them the additional argument that the people do not want silver anyhow. They will bag up your silver dollars the same way and ship them out of the country to get the profit of 4 cents on the dollar.

If we want to keep both metals in circulation we must either coin at an agreed standard between the commercial powers and ourselves, or if they will not agree, then we must coin upon their standard. That is the only solution of this question. If we are going to keep both metals, we must stop our coinage on the basis of 16 to 1 and coin at the rate of 15½ to 1. Instead of putting into a dollar 371¼ grains of fine silver, we must put 359.91 grains. Is it not obvious that if we go on coining at that rate and have a large stock of silver on hand when this collapse comes in Europe and the governments there shall be forced by their people to replenish the volume of circulation to prevent confiscation and ruin, we shall be on the same monetary platform with them?

Our silver and gold will stand in the relation of 15½ to 1 as theirs will, and there will be no disturbance of the commercial relations between those governments and ours so far as coin is concerned.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would you have the coinage unlimited at 15½?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; I would have the coinage of silver unlimited at that ratio. I may not meet the views of all the doctrinaires on this subject; I am somewhat of a doctrinaire myself, but I started upon the investigation of this question with a loyal devotion to truth and I have determined to follow it wherever I can see its light gleam on my pathway. I have just stated what seems to me to be the only reasonable solution of this question. Have we not been making overtures to the governments of Europe and sending commissions to induce them to agree upon some uniform basis of coinage? If they had stated they would agree to open their mints upon the basis of 15½ to 1 we would have acceded to the proposition; but they will not agree to adopt with us any specific ratio, either 16 to 1 or 15½ to 1 or anything else. France is afraid of Germany and Germany is afraid of France and the Latin Union. If they would have agreed to open their mints at 15½ to 1 it would have been the part of wisdom for us to have accepted the proposition. Why would it not be equally conducive to our interests now to adopt that standard without any agreement with them?

If we can not consent to change our ratio and coin with the commercial nations, then the next best thing is to open our mints to the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1. With the experience we have had on that subject we may change our standard in time to save our coins. We can do as our fathers did, although they did not act till their silver was all gone. If we coin freely both metals the world will have both in its circulation; whereas, if we take the advice of the scarce-money people and stop the coinage of silver, the world will have only one metal to measure its values, and the price of labor and the products of labor will come down, men will be thrown out of employment throughout the earth, tramps will fill the highways as they do to-day, and we will see a depth and an intensity of suffering we have never seen before.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to answer the real objection to the free coinage of silver. I have been dealing with the fine-spun sophistries which have been thrown around the subject. I come to uncover the false pretender, to take the mask from his face, to expose his repulsive features to the American people whom he seeks to defraud. The objection to the free coinage of silver is because it will increase the volume of circulation that measures the value of labor. It will make money cheap, but it will make the stroke of the arm dearer. It will make clothing dearer, it will make wheat dearer, it will make corn and cotton dearer, but it will make every day of toil bring a better price than it is now worth. The best condition of every people is that in which labor receives the highest possible reward for its toil. [Applause.] Mr. Clay once said in that old Hall out there that the highest wages and the highest interest for money were the best conditions in which any country could be placed.

There are about $6,000,000,000 of money in the world. Whatever the volume is it measures all the values of the world. I mean the money in circulation; I do not mean the money in the mines. I do not mean the money locked up in the Treasury vaults. I do not mean the money locked up in bank vaults; but I do mean whatever amount is in actual circulation, going into the markets, demanding exchanges, raises the price of labor and its products throughout the world. If you decrease that volume one-half, if you strike down silver, if you take it out of circulation, as Germany tried to do, and fix values alone by the gold standard, then the value of the products of labor would be reduced one-half.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. How about debts?

Mr. MILLS. I will come to that after awhile. If you take silver out of circulation we know there will be a decrease in the value of labor. What would be the consequence? Whenever prices are sinking money goes out of the market. Who is going to buy a piece of property when the price has been falling and continues to fall? Who is going to buy property when it is low to-day and still lower to-morrow? No one will buy in a market that is sinking. No one will buy property when it is sinking in price and has been sinking. So it is with money, the most sensitive of all things. What becomes of labor then? We have heard many fine things said about the laboring people, and by these very men who want to reduce the price of labor. What becomes of labor when money goes out of the market, and when the employer tells his hands, "You are needed no more; we have nothing for you to do?" Then the farmer can get nothing for his corn or his cotton or his wheat. He can not buy anything of the manufacturer. The manufacturer can not sell him anything, for he is not able to pay for it. Then there is a greater supply of labor than there is demand for it. Then comes upon the country the greatest possible suffering to all the laboring classes. There is no curse in existence like the contraction of the circulation. War and pestilence and famine may spread their baleful wings over the land, but the evils they bring with them are not to be compared to the contraction of circulation which throws out of employment from three to five millions of laborers, enforcing idleness, bringing tears to every cheek, sorrow and distress to every home, hunger and starvation to every door. Yet this is what these advocates of scarce money are asking us to do to-day in the name of the laborers.

Why is this thing done? Why, if money possessed no other qualification than that of a railroad or a steamship or of a bill of exchange, if it simply exchanged one commodity for another, you would not hear this creditor class making Rome howl with its denunciations of dishonest money.

But it is because money is a measure of value. When money is scarce it measures prices low. I will give you an instance of it. In 1870 corn was worth 92½ cents a bushel; there was a full circulation of money then. The whole money of the United States was not as much as it is to-day, but the actual circulation was more, and prices are low now, because there is more money locked up in vaults now than there was then. That congestion had not gone so far in those days, and the immense volume of money poured out during the war was scattered throughout the country and was felt in every market.

At this period, I say, corn was 92½ cents a bushel. The average value of last year was 54 cents a bushel. Now, let us see the difference. All values start first with the ground, with the agriculturist and the miner. The man who digs up the iron ore is the first man who puts any value on it, and it then goes through all of the various processes of manufacture. The man who raises the corn, who produces the cotton, the wheat, and the oats, is the first man who puts any value upon it. All is dependent upon him, just as the branch of the tree is dependent upon the trunk. But let us see the difference in values between then and now.

The corn crop of last year, in round numbers, amounted to 1,936,000,000 of bushels. It was worth 54 cents per bushel. If we had had the actual circulation of 1870 it would have retained the price of 1870, and the crop would have been worth $750,000,000 more than it is. Cotton was then worth 23½ cents a pound. The last year's crop was 6,500,000 bales. Cotton was worth, last year, 10 cents per pound. If we had had the same price for cotton we had in 1870 the cotton crop would have been worth $300,000,000 more than it was. We raised last year 350,000,000 bushels of wheat. It was worth, in 1870, $1.28 per bushel. Last year it was worth 86 cents per bushel. A loss of $150,000,000 on wheat. We raised last year 629,000,000 bushels of oats. They were worth, in 1870, 63 cents per bushel. They were worth last year 38 cents per bushel. A loss on the oat crop of over $1.. .,000,000. Here are four crops where scarce money, falsely called honest, has defrauded our farmers out of more than $1,300,000,000 in one year. But they are not the only ones injured.

If that money were in their pockets there would be wants behind every dollar, and to satisfy them all the labor of the land would be demanded. They would want more cotton and woolen goods and more manufactures of iron and steel, more boots and shoes, and more of everything that employs labor. So great would be the demand for manufacturing labor that every arm would be employed and all wages would be raised. Whenever there is an active demand for labor, its wages are raised. But when money is scarce and prices are low, the people find that the products of their labor all go to their creditor and they have nothing with which to buy.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] asked me a moment ago what about debts? That question goes to the bottom of this controversy. It is on account of debts that the creditor class is trying to make money scarce. They are trying to make the poor debtor work two days to pay that for which he owes one day's labor; and disguise it as you will, that is the head and front of the offense of the silver dollar. The debts of the people of the United States are set down at $25,000,000,000. It is a low estimate to say that its annual interest is at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. That is an annual drag on their labor of $1,250,000,000; in addition to that the taxes to support national, State, and local governments are $600,000,000 more. Now, with this enormous burden bending the backs of our people to the ground, is it not a crime to make money scarce, and thus lower the price of all the products of their labor? I want to repeat it, and emphasize it, that high prices for labor always bring prosperity to the country; and high prices can never be had with a scarce volume of money.

But notwithstanding the fact, which ought to be apparent to all, we are here debating how we can make money scarce. To enable us to do this all the old sophistries have been resurrected. The wheelbarrow of 1878 has been brought out of its long retirement and loaded down with "clipped" dollars and is on the road to market to buy a ham sandwich for breakfast. All the workmen in the country are to work for 100 cents in gold and be paid in a dishonest dollar worth 83 cents. All our gold which is locked up in the vaults of the bankers is to take wings and fly away, to the incalculable injury of a people who have never seen it. All the silver of the world is to be dumped down on us, and we are to be irretrievably ruined by being made the rich recipients of the hoarded treasures of forty centuries! Silver must be suppressed, gold must be made dearer, debts must be made harder to pay, the hours of labor must be made longer, the hours of rest must be made shorter, the products of labor must be made cheaper, or the laboring people will be cheated and the country ruined!

Scarce money has always been attended with disaster the world over. History tells us of its horrors in Europe, but we need not go beyond our own country for proof of the statement.

Mr. Chairman, from the time of the first discovery of the mines in the New World up to 1809 the world was full of money. Vessels of Spain were carrying into all the channels and marts of trade the wealth produced in the New World. The history of that period reads like a romance of the Middle Ages. The Spanish galleons with their cargoes of the precious metals were sailing over the ocean, loaded with the enormous productions of the mines of the New World. So rich was the booty, so tempting was the prize, that the ocean was soon covered with pirates, who swarmed in the track of the vessels to rob them. But in 1809 all the dependencies of Spain on this continent broke into open revolt for the establishment of their own independence. From 1809 to 1849 the mines were abandoned and closed up. The revolting provinces established their independence in 1823 after the long, exhausting struggle; and when they did establish their independence they were not strong enough or able to protect the owners of the mines in investing capital enough to work them. Up to 1849 the prices were low, so low that the difference between the prices from 1809 to 1849 show that they had risen from that time more than 100 per cent., and one distinguished author says 145 per cent.

There was only one exceptional period that I remember in all that long period of depression; and that was in 1836, when the country was taking a ride through the air on the Icarian wings of paper money. In 1835 the circulation amounted to one hundred and sixty-one millions of money. In 1836 it rose to two hundred and four millions. There was an addition of forty-three millions to the circulation in one year, and thirty-six millions of that amount was wild-cat paper money. But it increased prices, and while the circulation went up 30 per cent. in one year, prices went up 29 per cent. But the business of the country, like Icarus of old, soon felt its wings giving way, and it fell from a giddy height. Circulation contracted and prices tumbled. The downward tendency continued till 1843, when the circulation had fallen to $142,000,000 and prices had fallen correspondingly. This year was the year that prices touched the lowest point reached in this century.

In 1848 mines of gold were discovered in California, and they commenced pouring enormous quantities of that metal into the markets of the world, and in 1850 we had two hundred and sixty-five millions of money in circulation. Next year we had more, and prices went up. Next year still more, and prices still went up. And the circulation continued to increase year by year until 1857, when the volume of circulation was precisely 100 per cent. over 1850. We had $530,000,000 of circulation, actual circulation, and prices went up 31 per cent. above 1850. Each year prices rose above the year before, and there is no period of equal length in the history of this country when there was such unbounded prosperity in all the departments of our industry. The national wealth increased at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum. We had a good system of finance and taxation, and both aided in thrusting the country forward on the road to prosperity. In 1858 the circulation fell $88,000,000 below 1857, and prices fell 20 per cent. They commenced rising again when the war began and money was poured out all over the country, and touched the highest point ever reached in the country in 1865, when they were 4 per cent. higher in gold than in 1857, and the circulation rose to $1,157,000,000.

Mr. HATCH was recognized and yielded to Mr. MILLS.

Mr. MILLS. I thank my friend for his courtesy; I am nearly through.

About this time a number of gentlemen who had amassed a large amount of depreciated paper money started on a wild hunt after honest money—started to impress the Government with the necessity of coming with rapid strides back to gold—started to bring this country by forced marches to a gold currency. They commenced to contract the currency for that purpose, and prices came down till they brought the country to the crash of 1873. We certainly all remember that. We certainly all remember that from 1873 to 1879, after we had commenced the coinage of silver, this country passed through a period of darkness and gloom that has never been witnessed at any other time in its history, and God grant that it may never be witnessed again.

I remember standing here and seeing a venerable Representative of Pennsylvania (Mr. Hendrick B. Wright, now no more) rise and unroll a petition signed by 20,000 of his fellow-citizens asking this Government to relieve their distresses and, if it gave them no other relief, to give them some means of flying from their homes where starvation confronted themselves, their wives, and their children. We remember the time when the city of Pittsburgh was set on fire; when the United States Government had to send its armed troops to protect property and suppress the terrible disturbance made by the Congress of the United States bending its knees in devotion to the gold power of the East. Every State in the North tottered from turret to foundation-stone, and every one of them was calling on the Government of the United States to stretch its strong arms around them and help them to stand in the midst of the tempest of disorder and violence created by their distressed and suffering people. Three millions of men willing to work were out of employment. They could have earned $3,000,000 per day; but there was none to employ them. Bread and meat were cheap, house-rent was cheap, fuel was cheap, everything was cheap but gold. Gold was high, but the pockets of the workmen were all empty.

Would you take the country again through that valley of the shadow of death? Would you repeat again that experience so full of lamentations and mournings and woes? If you would, listen to the soft, sweet notes of the siren as she sings from the vaults of the national bankers about dishonest dollars. Drive out into banishment the old silver dollar of our fathers; call in the silver certificates; retire all the Treasury notes; make money so scarce that the poor bankers in New York can buy a bushel of wheat for a dime, a pound of cotton for a penny; make it impossible for people to pay their debts; make labor so cheap that working people can only earn enough to pay interest to money-lenders and taxes to support the Government, and you will see again the return of that night with all its horrors intensified.

Sir, let the man who lives by the sweat of his brow, and his Representative here, be not deceived by the shams and false pretenses that are thrown around this measure that is filled to the brim with the direst of consequences to millions of people. Let the laborer remember, and write it on his wristlets, carve it on his frontlets, and wear it as an amulet over his heart, that scarce money is his sleepless and unforgiving foe, a foe whose bosom never swells with a sigh of sorrow, whose eye never moistens with a tear of pity. No one can deny that it increases the burden of debt which labor must pay. No one can deny that it makes the life-struggle darker and harder.

One of the most distinguished advocates of the suppression of silver has but recently said if we stop coining silver that the act will be a drag upon production and that suffocation and strangulation are words not too strong to express the agonies of a people who are encircled in the coils of this golden serpent. And yet, with our eyes open and looking down into the abyss of human suffering that yawns before us, we are entreated and importuned to drag the country to the edge of the precipice and plunge it over into the tortures and agonies of contraction, to satiate the lust for gold. Sir, history has recorded on its pages every kind of scourge that has been sent upon mankind from the hand of his fellow, and it has carved the names of the guilty wretches on its pillory where they stand before the eyes of each recurring generation to suffer the execration due to the atrocity of their crimes. It tells of Nero vainly struggling to extinguish the truths of Christianity by lighting the streets of Rome with the burning bodies of her missionaries; of Tamerlane discussing philosophy with the sages of Aleppo while his savage soldiery were gathering the heads of his slaughtered foemen into monumental piles to please the eye of the royal invader; it tells of Philip II sacking, burning, and butchering the helpless inhabitants of the Netherlands, loyal to his kingdom and crown, because they elected to worship at the shrines where conscience bade them kneel; it tells of the obliteration of Poland, the partition of its territory, the banishment and confinement of its unhappy people in the caves of Siberia by the sceptered robbers of Russia, Prussia, and Austria; it tells of the conquest and long-continued oppression and robbery of Ireland by the kings, parliaments, and people of England for five hundred years, and that in the face of the remonstrances of all Christendom still stretches her victim on the bed of torture.

But in all the wild, reckless, and remorseless brutalities that have marked the footprints of resistless power there is some extenuating circumstance that mitigates the severity of the punishment due to the crime. Some have been the product of the fierce passions of war, some have come from the antipathy that separates alien races, some from the superstitions of opposing religions. But the crime that is now sought to be perpetrated on more than fifty millions of people comes neither from the camp of a conqueror, the hand of a foreigner, nor the altar of an idolator. But it comes from those in whose veins runs the blood of a common ancestry, who were born under the same skies, speak the same language, reared in the same institutions, and nurtured in the principles of the same religious faith. It comes from the cold, phlegmatic, marble heart of avarice—avarice that seeks to paralyze labor, increase the burden of debt and fill the land with destitution and suffering to gratify the lust for gold [applause]—avarice surrounded by every comfort that wealth can command, and rich enough to satisfy every want save that which refuses to be satisfied without the suffocation and strangulation of all the labor in the land. With a forehead that refuses to be ashamed it demands of Congress an act that will paralyze all the forces of production, shut out labor from all employment, increase the burden of debts and taxation, and send desolation and suffering into all the homes of the poor. In this hour, fraught with peril to the whole country, I appeal to the unpurchased representatives of the American people to meet this bold and insolent demand like men. Let us stand in the breach and call the battle on, and never leave the field until the people's money shall be restored to the mints on equal terms with gold as it was years ago. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the silver bill, but the bill to which the amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know how the gentleman from Ohio gets the floor in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] yielded all his time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. The gentleman from Texas used as much of it as he desired, and yielded the floor. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] then rose and was recognized by the Chair, and had been speaking for a minute or more before the point was raised.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the attention of the House for a few moments while I call attention to the provisions of the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This bill seeks to amend a law which has been on the statute-book fifteen years, and which allows to distillers the fraction of a gallon under one-half when in drawing off spirits into original packages there is a fraction of less than one-half gallon. That is, no account is taken of that fraction. Originally distillers paid tax only on the amount of spirits that went into consumption. Subsequently the payment of tax was required upon the entire production of every still, without regard to whether the spirits go into consumption or not. The tax upon every proof-gallon of spirits is about 600 per cent. more than the cost thereof. It costs 13 to 15 cents to produce a gallon of whisky, and the tax upon that quantity is 90 cents. This is the only article manufactured in this country upon which the tax is 500 or 600 per cent. more than the cost of production. Beyond that, it is the only article in this country upon which the tax is required to be paid before the article goes into consumption, and without reference to whether it goes into consumption or not.

Now, there may be some gentlemen here—I take it for granted there are a number—who are not familiar with the course of internal-revenue legislation upon this subject; and I call attention to this matter because I only demand, in behalf of my constituents and the trade generally, that which is fairly and decently just—no more and no less. I do not ask that they shall escape the payment of taxes upon one gill of manufactured spirits. I only ask that they shall not be taxed upon that which they not only do not consume, but are not permitted to keep, handle, consume, or sell.

Now, under our former legislation—I think it was the law of 1869—an allowance was made with direct reference to preventing the requirement of the payment of tax upon spirits which were not consumed, or rather out of which the distiller was unable to realize anything.

Let me state that in the manufacture of distilled spirits the distiller does not handle or touch the spirits distilled until they are drawn off and gauged by a Government officer. The spirits, when so drawn from the cisterns, are placed in barrels and conveyed to what is known as a distillery warehouse; and by the gauge taken by the officer at that time the manufacturer is required to pay tax. That fixes the extent and limit and measure of his liability. It invariably happens that in drawing off the spirits, and taking them to a Government warehouse and thence to the rectifiers or compounders a loss is entailed—not of half a gallon merely, but from that quantity up to three gallons and a half, the distiller or rectifier deriving no benefit at all from that much of the spirits manufactured, that quantity being a total loss. Under what is known as the "Carlisle bill," passed in 1878 or 1879—and, in fact, long before that—an allowance for this loss was made. Under the law of 1868 distillers were required to pay tax upon every fractional part of a gallon; so that if a man had in his barrel 43 gallons and a gill or a pint, he was required to pay tax upon 44 gallons. That was manifestly wrong.

Not only was the distiller required to pay a tax of 500 per cent. more than the cost of the article produced; not only was he required to pay without reference to its going into consumption, to pay beforehand, thus advancing his money to the Government, but he was required to pay tax upon what he never produced, and what of course he could not consume or sell. That was so palpably unjust, that under a provision of law—not the "Carlisle bill," but a previous act—an allowance was made, so that in all cases when the spirits came from the still there was a fraction of over half a gallon the Government exacted tax for a gallon, and whenever the fraction was less than half a gallon the Government gave the distiller the benefit of the fraction and charged him no tax upon that. The reason for granting this allowance was that it was ascertained beyond peradventure that the loss by soakage, &c., in removal to and from the distillery warehouse was in every instance an absolute loss of more than half a gallon, running up in fact as high as three and one-half gallons.

I speak now of what is known as high wines. In Kentucky and Pennsylvania they manufacture Bourbon whisky. High wine is made by a different process. But when Bourbon whisky is first made the manufacturer does not put it upon the market. Why? Because at that time it is not fit for consumption. It contains fusel oil, which only passes off by aging. Therefore it is placed in a warehouse and kept there. Fifty members who are now within the sound of my voice remember very well that in 1879, in order not to do a wrong to the distillers of Kentucky, the law was so amended as to allow those gentlemen a leakage or loss of from 1 to 7½ gallons. It was thoroughly just. Why? Because the Government ascertained that those distillers, out of the amount they placed in the warehouse, necessarily suffered a loss to that extent; in other words, that every warehouse-man or distiller lost from 1 to 7½ gallons on each barrel, and hence it was thought to be an outrage upon the distiller to exact tax upon that which the distiller did not have and which did not enter into consumption. The high-wine distillers do not get any benefit from that law. They do not prepare the goods for market by aging. The fusel oil is removed from what are known as high wines by distillation or rectifying. Hence the only allowance they have is one-half gallon allowed in the manner I have suggested. Now that allowance has been by virtue of the statute for fourteen or fifteen years.

Some brother asks me why this bill was introduced. I will tell you why. A few years ago, and with almost unanimous consent in this House, small original packages of spirits containing 10 gallons were allowed to be put up to meet what was described here as the South American trade. It was said quite a trade was being built up with South America, and that they required 10-gallon packages in order to carry them up into the Andes on the backs of mules. It was ascertained, however, that trade did not amount to much. This bill is the result of an abuse of the privilege mentioned, that is, of filling 10-gallon cans as original packages. That law, as stated, authorized the putting up of these 10-gallon packages for the benefit of those engaged in the South American trade. They shipped them at once to South America, and there they took them on the backs of mules up into the Andes, or wherever else they were to be carried. That was the object of that provision.

Prior to that time no original package of less than 20 gallons (half-barrel) was permitted. What was the result? Under this law certain distillers to cover losses began to put up 10-gallon packages to take from their distilleries to the rectifying-houses, so that they saved a half-gallon on each 10-gallon package. That was unjust. It was a palpable wrong against the spirit of the law, for the 10-gallon keg was not a commercial package recognized under the law by the trade. And now, because certain distillers were disposed to abuse a right which ought to belong to every distiller, it has pleased our friends of the Committee on Ways and Means to punish the few by doing a great injustice to all distillers and dealers in high wines in Ohio and many other localities.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Representing the greatest distilling center, I had the honor to introduce that bill, the object of which was to prevent that abuse.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend no doubt did so as the representative of the Peoria district of Illinois. I will tell him why his people are quite satisfied to have this bill pass, while mine are not. His people will not say, nor any one of them, that the loss each distiller sustains in putting up a package or half-barrel or barrel is not at least one-half gallon. I know no distiller will say so. Now, why are the constituents of my honored friend satisfied to have this change? I will tell you. Peoria does not rectify or redistil and compound spirits to any extent. She ships her goods to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and in each barrel she puts 84 proof-gallons. The freight is about the same. Our people in Cincinnati do an immense business in compounding. Peoria putting two barrels into one can afford to lose a half-gallon. If our people on the same amount are compelled to lose a gallon she has an advantage just in that way. And to-day if she was doing compounding as we are doing in our city of Cincinnati she would not be satisfied to lose a gallon on every barrel. She has just that advantage, because in each barrel she ships 84 proof-gallons. I do not speak of wine-gallons but of proof-gallons. This half-gallon is cut off too with us. We do not ship but manufacture, and on each barrel we lose half a gallon.

Some brother may say, but I observe your distillers always construct the package so as to get the fraction on their side. Exactly. The object of the statute was to prevent them sustaining an actual loss. That was the very object of it, and hence they construct the package in that way in order that the law intended for their benefit might not prove an actual injury. What is there wrong about it? Why are statutes provided against the loss by leakage? If I withdraw 10,000 gallons at Cincinnati to ship to Europe I am allowed for leakage, although I do not pay a cent of tax to the Government, the spirits being for export. If I make a thousand barrels of Bourbon whisky and store it and keep it for three years, I may be allowed 7½ gallons on the barrel.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me complete what I was about to say, that this was a just measure. I supported it myself, knowing it to be just; but now it occurs that our people, and I speak for men all over the country, in different sections of the country, for the entire wholesale trade, for every establishment that manufactures high wines, unless they are so situated that by imposing a loss upon business rivals, as is proposed by this bill, they can gain enough to remunerate them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio do the Peoria distillers ship high wines or whisky?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, they are in a measure convertible terms. They ship alcohol—high-proof spirits.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman does not mean to say that high wines and whisky are convertible terms?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why not, if you take the fusel oil out? Why, some even drink high wines.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If they shipped mainly alcohol and high wines what would be the difference in the tax?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me complete my statement. Undoubtedly they ship double portions, and by compelling us to lose the gallon on the package they can well afford to lose the half gallon. They ship two barrels in one. But they very naturally conclude if they can compel you (their competitors) to lose the gallon they are perfectly willing to stand the half-gallon loss.

Mr. MORRISON. They can avoid all that by taking a big, honest barrel.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We do not ask to use any other kind than such as have been known to the trade and the law ever since spirits were taxed in this country. I am here to say that from my friend's district, Peoria, and the district of my other friend from Iowa also—for they have large distilleries out there—they ship largely the high-proof spirits and alcohol. Eighty per cent. of all the high wines and alcohol received in New York was received from these points. They can well afford the loss of the half-gallon if their competitors are forced to lose the gallon by this system of allowances. And that is the reason my brethren are so amiable in support of this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My friend from Ohio is so familiar with the whisky question that I fear he is going away altogether from those of us who have not so much information upon the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is not familiarity with its use; only its careful manipulation as a matter of Government taxation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I cheerfully concede the gentleman's superior ability in the direction of its manipulation. But let me ask, as a matter of information, do I understand you to mean that under the Peoria system, that as they ship high wines they do not break bulk and therefore get the benefit of the half-gallon, whereas in Ohio where they rectify the high wines and make it into whisky——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And other compounds.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is that not rectification?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is compounding.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman's technical and chemical knowledge. But under the Ohio system you claim you break bulk near the distilleries not within 600 feet perhaps.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They do not break packages at the distillery.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Well, I understand you to claim that they lose one gallon, when the Peoria distiller, who ships high wines, loses but one half-gallon.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They do not break bulk at the distillery. They have no right to do so. It is gauged as it is turned out, and it is then taken to the distillery warehouse, thence to the rectifiers or compounders.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If they ship in the barrels in which it is deposited can they get the benefit of this half-gallon?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly. If you are the Government gauger and gauge the spirits at my distillery, if you please; if the amount of whisky contained in the barrel is 43.49 gallons, you take no account of the odd half-gallon or less. If it runs over that I must pay for it, that is, tax on a whole gallon.

Now the question is where is there a remedy for the condition of affairs to which I have referred? I take it that the House as a mere matter of taking a tilt at this particular industry does not desire to do injustice. I propose to offer an amendment to the bill, restoring the old law in regard to size of original packages or barrels. For fifteen years these men have been allowed this privilege as a matter of equal and exact justice. I propose to offer an amendment restoring that old law which prohibits the use of smaller packages than the half-barrel. Now if I am right about that, that all that this House desires is to prevent the abuse of the statute allowing 10-gallon packages, leaving untouched the just provision of the law allowing the distiller the fraction of a gallon, and I can accomplish this by the amendment I offer, it seems to me that my honored friend from Illinois ought to cheerfully co-operate with me.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio if the class of distillers who are opposing this bill is not the same class that wanted the 10-gallon system?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Some are, no doubt, for convenience of shipping purposes.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Is the gentleman sure that that is the only reason?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am quite sure of it. But if we can correct the abuse by an amendment to the law, why does my friend from Illinois still insist on the passage of a bill which works a great hardship and wrong to every distiller in the country where they make high wines other than for shipment to distant markets?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I will answer very candidly, if he will ship the liquors in whole packages I have no objection. But by reducing the old law from twenty to ten gallons you divide the evil instead of eradicating it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend is falling into the error of supposing there is an evil. There is no evil in not allowing the Government to exact a tax where no tax is due. I have here a communication from a gentleman largely engaged in the distilling business which puts this matter in a clear light and which I will hereafter submit to the House. The fact is, the losses allowed by law do not approximately cover the actual loss. The amount ought to be increased instead of being diminished. My friend will observe that ever since we have collected the tax on distilled spirits the use of the half-barrel has been allowed and no hardship results. In the first place, we exact payment of tax on more liquor than ever goes into consumption, contrary to the law of every other nation that taxes distilled spirits, and contrary to the usage of our own country prior to 1868. All we ask is that we pay on what we get, and no more; and nothing can be more just than that.

I shall desire to say something further on this subject when my amendment is offered. The statement I have alluded to shows that this whole protection does not amount to 1 per cent., while the loss is over 3 per cent. by actual test. Now what is the trouble? A few distillers used improperly 10-gallon packages, and exacted an allowance they ought not to have had; and to meet that abuse this other abuse on the part of the Government is proposed.

I submit to the House as to the country that to correct an abuse by the citizen by committing another by governmental action is not just. In Kentucky, Pennsylvania, every locality where Bourbon whiskies are manufactured, they are allowed as high as 7½ gallons outage to protect them against loss. Our people only ask to be allowed a half-gallon to each original package in pursuance of the law that has been on the statute-books during all the period I have mentioned, fourteen or fifteen years. They do not wish to escape payment on a gill they get. I insisted on this floor, as many of you will remember, that this Government was unjust to exact tax on goods that did not go into use; and this House, by a vote of 3 to 1, adopted that idea and passed a bill prepared by your Committee on Ways and Means in which they determined that the tax should be collected on spirits drawn out of the distillery warehouses and put on the market, and not arbitrarily on all that ran from the still.

The amount allowed for loss from the barrel is one half-gallon, and I show here by figures prepared by dealers and manufacturers that in point of fact that does not cover it. And if not, why insist on taking away even that poor measure of justice? It is simply to impose a tax on 1 gallon of whisky to every barrel which the distiller does not get and never sells. Is that just from any possible standpoint where there is a seasoning of the commonest desire to treat this industry fairly?

I am not enthusiastic to demand special advantages to the liquor trade; so far as that is concerned, I simply stand here representing a great interest which has paid in the districts represented by my colleague [Mr. BROWNE] and myself over $200,000,000 to the Government, and I submit it is only fair and proper to those people that no law be passed which is unjust in its provisions, and I submit that this is.

I may have stated the amount paid by our districts much too low. They have paid from nine to thirteen million dollars a year. I submit they are entitled to some consideration. And I say this because some thoroughly temperance brethren refusing to look at this from a practical business standpoint, as a commercial matter simply, tilt at it because it relates to whisky. That, in my judgment, is neither wise, dignified, nor statesmanlike. It is a business transaction, and I desire the House shall not pass a law that is unjust; that we shall at least know the facts in this matter, in order that it may be known, if we persist, we are sinning against the light, since the truth is that the Government suffers no damage even if the law remained as now, and beyond question the alleged abuse will be cured by the amendment I offer.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Before the gentleman from Ohio resumes his seat, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I wish to ask whether it was the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to whom he referred or myself.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am quite willing you should divide the honors.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have here some figures to which I will call the attention of the committee at the proper time. I desire to reserve the balance of my time, and I will hereafter submit these figures and my amendment, and, with that understanding, will move that the committee rise.

Mr. MORRISON. When the House shall again go into Committee of the Whole on this subject, if the committee will allow me, I will undertake to explain the bill I have reported and the reasons why I think it ought to pass.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I announced a few moments ago that I desired to address the House upon the pending amendment, but after conferring with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means I have concluded not to ask that privilege now, but will await an opportunity to address the House upon economic questions at some other time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which has charge of the matter to which they relate.

Mr. BEACH. I shall have to object. They can be referred in the morning.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a privileged report from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BEACH. I must object.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion of Mr. HAMMOND was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

TREASURY CONSCIENCE FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1886.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of Senate resolution of the 28th ultimo, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate as to the origin of what is known as the "Conscience Fund" in the Treasury of the United States, the amount of the same, and what disposition is made thereof.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that the term "conscience fund," as applied to donations received by the Treasury from unknown sources, has its origin in the popular belief that such donations are made by persons who have at some time wrongfully taken or withheld from the United States moneys which were justly due and who thus seek to make restitution to the Government.

The moneys which have thus been received from time to time have been covered into the Treasury as "miscellaneous receipts from persons unknown," and have been used for the general purposes of the Government in connection with moneys received from other sources, having at no time been distinguished from other moneys in the general Treasury.

The first donation of this character of which the Department has any record was made by the Register of the Treasury in 1827, "for moneys received from a person unknown, stated to be on account of imports and tonnage," and the total amount received by the Treasury up to June 30, 1885, was $220,747.26.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Public Printer, showing the condition of the public printing, binding, &c., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Edward D. Patchin, son of Bernard Patchin, late a private in Company B, Forty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey; which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

State of New Jersey—concurrent resolution.

Whereas information has reached the Legislature that a bill has been introduced into Congress providing for the erection of a bridge or viaduct over the navigable waters separating this State from the State of New York where the tide ebbs and flows, which, if made, will be contrary to a statute of this State entitled "A supplement to an act respecting bridges," approved April 10, 1846, and which supplement was approved April 5, 1878; and

Whereas the lands under the said waters are the property of the State of New Jersey to the middle thereof by original acquisition by the colony of New Jersey, and by subsequent treaty with the State of New York, dated September 16, 1833, ratified and confirmed by act of Congress passed June 28, 1834; and

Whereas it hath been declared and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that "the right of eminent domain over the shores and the soil under the navigable waters, for all municipal purposes, belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they only, have the constitutional power to exercise it;" that "inspection laws form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government; inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass," and that "bridges are of the same nature with ferries, and are undoubtedly within the category thus laid down;" and

Whereas the judiciary of the State of New York, as well as other States, has solemnly reasserted this doctrine: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of assembly (the senate concurring), That the State of New Jersey doth hereby solemnly and respectfully protest against any action on the part of the Congress of the United States, by statute or otherwise, having for its object the erection of a bridge over said navigable waters, as being beyond the powers conferred by the Constitution of the United States and a usurpation of a power belonging, so far as its own territory extends, to the State of New Jersey.

2. That while in no wise denying the power of Congress to regulate commerce by directing the manner in which such a bridge, if duly authorized by the States of New Jersey and New York, should be erected and providing that it do not obstruct navigation, yet the State of New Jersey distinctly takes the position that the erection of such bridge can only be authorized by said States of New York and New Jersey.

3. That the attempt to legalize such a bridge in advance of its construction by enacting that it shall be a post-road is an evident subterfuge, and should be rejected as an attempt to establish a precedent under which all exclusive powers of the States may be set at naught.

4. That in aid of this her protest New Jersey invokes the sympathy of all her sister States in the maintenance of the doctrine of established and acknowledged State rights. Only through preserving those rights and the powers of the General Government in just equipoise can the nation we compose continue her happy and beneficent career.

5. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives, with the request that they be presented to Congress, and that they use their utmost endeavors to defeat any bill such as that referred to.

I certify that these resolutions passed the house of assembly of the State of New Jersey on Wednesday, January 27.

SAMUEL TOOMBS,
Clerk House of Assembly.

I certify that these resolutions passed the senate of New Jersey on February 3, 1886.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 5186) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1302, Order of Business 128.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy and fixing the salary of the same.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope before that consent is given the Senator from Pennsylvania will enlighten the Senate not only as to the necessity for the creation of this office, but also as to the necessity for haste in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill? which must be decided without debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy and fixing the salary of the same, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments: in line 3, before the word "Department," to insert "Navy," and after the word "Department" to strike out the words "of the Secretary of the Navy;" and in line 5, after the word "person," to insert "from civil life;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President shall appoint in the Navy Department, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a competent person from civil life who shall be called the assistant Secretary of the Navy, whose salary shall be $4,000, payable in the same manner as the salary of the Secretary of the Navy, who shall perform all such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, belonging to that Department, as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy or as may be required by law, and who shall act as Secretary of the Navy in the absence of that officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These amendments will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. CAMERON. I will state for the information of the Senator from Kansas and the Senate that I know of no reason why there should be very great haste about the passage of the bill, but I have called it up at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, who seems to think that the service requires some assistance, and it was thought best by the committee that that assistance should come from civil life, and so the committee proposed that amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it is sound policy not merely to take the Secretary of the Navy and his assistant from civil life, but to tie up the President of the United States so that even if a war should break out he would not have the power of calling into the service of the Government a person who is now in the Navy and who has the experience with naval affairs of a naval officer or a naval engineer or whatever. While practically he would ordinarily be taken from civil life, I have never heard any reason suggested against having naval officers except that the jealousies, disputes, and cliques in the Navy might be excited by it when one would be preferred to another. Why should not the President of the United States have the right, if he saw fit, in case of a war, to call some competent person who has naval experience to the assistance of the head of the Department?

Mr. CAMERON. I will say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that it was to avoid the jealousies of which he speaks, more than anything else, that the amendment was placed in the bill by the committee. The President has authority at any time to appoint any naval officer he chooses to this position, who would thereupon resign his former position in the Navy; so that the bill does not prevent the Government from getting the service of a naval officer, if it is desired to have it.

Mr. HALE. This whole subject was investigated pretty thoroughly by the Committee on Naval Affairs in a previous Congress, and it was found then by consultation with the head of the Department and from the experience of the committee in relation to that Department, having a near relation to it, that one thing greatly needed in the Navy Department is a further infusion of civilian or business experience and competency. The Department is growing in importance as a great business Department, and if we go on and reconstruct the Navy, as I hope we may and as there is a prospect we may, there will be a large amount of added business matters thrown into that Department.

Each Secretary for the last ten years or more, during all the time that I have had any knowledge of the operation of the Department, has felt the need of a civilian assistant. He has nobody now in the whole Department whom, even in his absence, he can call upon to take the whole charge and responsibility temporarily, but must have recourse to some naval officer at the head of one of the bureaus, and that at once gives rise to what the Senator from Pennsylvania has referred to, the jealousies of rank and of other kinds that are continually pestering this Department.

I should be very glad to see the bill go further. I have the impression that there are certain bureaus of the Navy Department, the business bureaus, that in the case of a reorganization of the Department can better be put under a civilian business head.

The trouble will be, unless it is foreclosed in the bill and provided that the appointment shall be from civil life, that there will always be more or less solicitation on the part of officers or sets of officers for the place to be filled by a naval officer, and that at once arouses jealousy and animosity, while a competent civilian put into the Department through the President to work with the Secretary arouses no such feeling.

In the case suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, if any thoroughly competent naval officer desires to resign his commission in order that a Secretary may have him as an assistant, he can come within the provisions of the bill, and upon resignation would leave all that domain of competition and animosity which surrounds and includes naval officers and would be in civil life, and therefore would be eligible under the bill. So that case is provided for. It is another thing to select a naval officer over and above his fellows and put him in the place.

As to times of emergency that may arise in the Department, the Secretary has the power and the President has the power, and it is freely exercised, to summon bright, competent, able naval officers for consultation by means of advisory boards or other processes well known and resorted to by the Navy Department, so that the head of the Department gets the benefit of the brains and the wit of the Navy in that way.

But I believe that it is essential to this bill and to the good running of the Department that this officer should be taken from civil life, and that if it is, as I have said, foreclosed in the bill it puts an end to all question, and then the President and the Secretary may search the land for a competent business man, and he will add to the executive force and strength of that Department very greatly, and I think the sooner it is done the better. The present Secretary feels the need as former Secretaries have done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, who has had considerable experience in connection with the Committee on Naval Affairs, if he thinks there is a necessity for such an officer as is provided for in the bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes, I do. So great was the necessity, that once before Congress, upon a statement of the case, provided this officer, and it became a part of the enacted law that he should be added to the force of the Navy Department; but the salary was left at so small a rate that the Secretary could not obtain the services of a man such as he desired to be in that place. No objection was made then, because the need seemed to be imperative; and I know that any Secretary who has been examined before the committee, or any committee I will say, during the last twenty years, would have stated the needs much more strongly than I have done of this additional officer. Other Departments have assistant secretaries. This Secretary has none. I believe the Navy Department and the War Department are the only Departments which have no assistant secretary. I hope the Senate will pass the bill to-day, so that it may go to the other branch and become a law as soon as may be.

Mr. PLUMB. We have got along without an assistant Secretary of the Navy for a good many years, during a period of time in which the Navy had more to do than I think either the Senator from Maine or I will ever live to see it do again. No matter how large it may become, it is not likely to have the important functions to perform during the generation that we are a part of that it had from 1861 to 1865.

Mr. CAMERON. It had an assistant secretary at that time.

Mr. HALE. There was an assistant Secretary of the Navy during the war. He was dropped after the war.

Mr. PLUMB. That is just what I was coming to. The moment the war was over it occurred to everybody who realized that we had been carrying on this Department in the time of a great emergency that the force which was needed for that purpose was not needed any longer.

We have seen all the Departments of the Government during the last few years reaching out for new officers; and yet in the most of them the business really diminishes. The Navy Department does not do, and can not possibly do, the business it did during the war, and, so far at least as we can foresee, it will not have it to do in the future. And so with the War Department. The Interior Department, which has control of public lands and pensions and business of that kind, which is increasing, needs, of course, all the while an added force; but the Navy and the War Departments are not in that condition.

Nothing of this kind is needed, except upon the theory that we need a few more persons to perform the social duties of this beautiful and growing capital. There is no duty to be performed by the present Secretary of the Navy that was not required to be performed by his predecessor and by all those who preceded him since the close of the war. The fact that we may build a few more ships in the future than in the past adds nothing, because they will not be all built in one year. The addition of these adds but little to the active business of the Department, because the regular machinery can take on more as well as less without extra help. And the appliances for such added work are not such as an assistant Secretary of the Navy would be able to materially aid.

When the Secretary of the Navy desires to build a ship he calls in an advisory board. He takes the counsel of civilians who are expert in the business, men of approved reputation and judgment and consults with them. No assistant Secretary of the Navy will ever perform any part of that function for him; and he ought not to do it, because we ought more to concentrate the responsibility as we concentrate the power of that Department. There ought to be no assistant Secretary of the Navy who is to act instead of the Secretary and take away that responsibility which ought to devolve upon the Secretary, and which ought to be always present with him in the discharge of his duty.

One of the vices of the Executive Department as now carried on is that responsibility is fixed nowhere. Commencing in any of the bureaus we have a chief; next to him is some one separated from him only by a few hundred dollars perhaps of salary, and so on through all the grades clear down until we get to the person who closes and opens the doors; and the responsibility is shaded off in precisely the same way. In place of having Secretaries and heads of bureaus who are responsible for all the acts conducted nominally under their authority, we find that they shuffle off that responsibility to the next below them, and then onto the next, and so on all the way down, until you can not fix the responsibility of the action or non-action of any of the Departments in any satisfactory way.

The Departments are not carried on on the basis of the responsibility of their respective heads, but by a machine which runs just the same when the Secretary is absent as when he is present, which is largely independent of him, and in which the responsibility is divided among the employés largely with reference to their emoluments, each one having his own responsibility, and the Secretary having practically none. If anything goes wrong, he simply says: "This machine was not organized right; it was organized before I came here. I am the creature of the hour; here for only a short time at best, and liable to go out at any moment; but this Department, like the brook, goes on forever and forever; and as I found it so I leave it." No Secretary has yet had the courage, if having the ability, to tackle his Department with a determination to thoroughly reorganize it in order that it might represent in all its parts his judgment and reflect his will.

It is not the addition of an assistant secretary that the Navy Department wants; it is reorganization from top to bottom; and just as long as we stand here ready to supply new officers for the purpose of meeting temporary conditions we shall not have reorganization. Instead of reorganization we shall constantly be half-soling it, putting on here and there, according to supposed emergencies, and leaving the great error of defective organization, of machine management, of an indurated condition of things, which produces little of merit and nothing of the highest degree except the drawing of salaries and the expenditure of public money.

I think that the present Secretary of the Navy, able and expert as I have no doubt he is, could get along without an assistant secretary just as his predecessor did. I am very sure that he will not build any more ships in any one year than his predecessor did. He will not be called on to exercise in any way any more skill, any more judgment, or to put any more of his time into the discharge of the Department business than his predecessors have done; and he will not do it, either.

The heads of the Departments are the ornamental part of the machine. They give no character to the work that is being done. That, as I said, was organized before them, and will continue after them. If there is an assistant secretary there it is just simply another rose in the button-hole, another ornamental but practically useless appendage; but the real fundamental business of the Departments will be done underneath, as it always has been, as it ought not to be done, as it will be until we reorganize the Departments on the principle of the responsibility of their respective heads.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am sorry the Senator from Kansas does not take the view of this case which the committee did, and which was so thoroughly presented by the Senator from Maine. I am in favor of the bill.

Let us presuppose that this Secretary of the Navy is anxious to reform the abuses to which the Senator from Kansas has referred, reform the processes of doing business; let us take for granted that he desires to make himself a useful and influential public officer. There is work for him, great work for him possibly in that Department.

I find that the previous Secretaries complained that they were hampered more or less; they desired additional assistance of a certain character. I recollect that while the Republicans in power were very anxious to give the Navy additional work to do in the regeneration of our Navy, the building of new ships, there was continual criticism made upon the processes of business in the Departments. Sometimes the criticism was in the form of attacks, not to say bitter and personal attacks, on the chiefs of the Navy. At other times the criticism was directed to the awkward and cumbersome methods of doing business. Now, take it for granted that we have put an able, a capable, an ambitious man into that place; that there is such a one in the place now. He goes there and finds himself, so far as the work of the Navy is concerned, absolutely alone. He has a chief clerk, to be sure, who is a civilian, but it is not required or expected that he is to be the sort of man that the Secretary can detail to various classes of work wherein he requires assistance. The chief clerk has his own limited and laborious field of duty. Now, this Department expends, say, twelve to sixteen million dollars a year, and I hope is to expend more, for I have no shadow of doubt that the American people will demand that we shall have something resembling a respectable navy, which we have not now. There is to be a larger expenditure there; and in conducting that work, as well as in reforming the existing methods, we require a capable Secretary, and I know of no business in civil life anywhere expending twelve or fifteen million dollars annually that would think it an unreasonable thing that the president or the chief manager thereof should have a confidential deputy, an able and responsible man.

Here, for example, is a certain field of inquiry that comes before the Secretary; we will say it is to inquire into the capabilities of the private works of the country to build steel ships, or it is to consider a particular form of armor, or a particular form of gun, or a reform in the organization of the different departments of the Navy; whom shall the Secretary now send for? For some of these things he could find a capable man, but for others, for the correction of abuses in organization, is he to detail the identical men who have been conducting these things in this manner?

A man who desires new business vigor and organization there I say is absolutely alone; and when he desires this investigation to be conducted or this work to be done, he can do it himself if he can leave his office for a day or a week or a fortnight to do it. I think it only reasonable to give him a civilian; we suppose he will select only an able business man from civil life who without prejudice will be entirely outside of the professional rivalries and jealousies, and, if you please, the Bourbonism likely to grow up in any branch of the service.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, this matter was very fully discussed some two years ago before the Committee on Appropriations where it was presented very ably both by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Chandler being then Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Lincoln Secretary of War. The committee and Congress agreed that they had made out a necessity for an assistant secretary in each of these Departments so clearly that a law was passed authorizing each of them to employ an assistant at $3,500 a year. I understand that they were unable to obtain for that salary the character of assistants that they needed and the places were not filled. Am I correct in that? I think I am. I believe I am correct in saying they were unable to fill the places.

Mr. HALE. That is so.

Mr. BECK. I became satisfied after a thorough examination that they ought to have such assistants, and that they ought to have men of the very highest order of capacity, and that $4,000 a year was the proper salary that ought to be given to them. The main argument was this—it is as good to-day as it was then and always will be—that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are the only civilians in either of these Departments who are in authority. The Secretary has to deal with organized bodies of men in each of these Departments who have their own views, their own jealousies, their own organizations within themselves, staff and line, and all sorts of things, and the moment his back is turned and he has to leave the Department in charge of somebody, he has to pick a man belonging to one set or the other of some of the organizations within his Department.

It was shown to us conclusively, and the fact is as plain now as it ever was, that the Secretary, being the only civilian in power, felt that he could not leave his Department and put it in charge of any one, no matter how able or conscientious he might be, who belonged to the naval or military organization of the country, without the fear that something would be done that would upset what he had previously determined should be done. He also needs an assistant for consultation for examination, not only because of the large amount of money to be expended, but as to new plans for guns, for ships, and so on. He needs some confidential, able man, himself a civilian, who can take his place when he is absent and with whom he can consult freely without having to call on any of the officers of the Army or the Navy who were liable to be warped or prejudiced to one particular view or another. Having so much money to disburse, having so many things to consider, and having to be absent from time to time and leave the Department in charge of somebody, it seemed to us then, and it seems to me now, that it is not wise, in order to save a salary, to prevent these two executive officers from having able men with whom they can confer, civilians not attached to the Army or the Navy, but having confidential relations with the Secretary himself, as I said, the only civilian in each Department, who has to arbitrate and judge between conflicting claims that come before him. Such a salary should be allowed as will enable us to get a good man, in whose hands in the Secretary's absence, or in consultation with whom, the interests of the United States would be safe without the risk that has been run heretofore.

That was made very plain to the committee both by Secretary Chandler and Secretary Lincoln. Their statement made an impression on my mind, and I understand and believe that we made a great mistake in not making the salary $4,000 instead of $3,500. It would be a matter of economy, a matter of prudence, a matter of good administration.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. I ask if we did not repeal the provision for the assistant Secretary of the Navy at the special request of Secretary Chandler?

Mr. BECK. I do not know.

Mr. PLUMB. That is my recollection.

Mr. BECK. I am not sure about that. I know I looked into the question very carefully.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, in 1882 we passed in one of the appropriation bills, I think perhaps the legislative bill, a provision allowing an assistant Secretary of the Navy and an assistant Secretary of War, the salary of each to be $3,500. These officers were not appointed by the President, and I think on the 3d of March, 1883, we repealed the law providing for these two assistant secretaries. I am not clear now as to the reason given for the repeal at the time. The Senator from Kansas seems to think it was at the request of the Secretary of the Navy. It is possible that persons could not be found of sufficient capacity to fill those places, but the reason that governed the committee in fixing the salary at $3,500 was that, with one exception, is the salary now paid to assistant secretaries, and we thought then if we set the example of paying $4,000 or $4,500 as is now suggested by the Senator from Kentucky to these new assistant secretaries, of necessity we should have to increase the compensation of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Interior. For myself I believe that the salaries now paid to the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Interior are not sufficient for the securement of men of sufficient capacity to discharge the duties they are called upon to discharge.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator from Iowa is wrong about the pay of the Assistant Secretary of State. The First Assistant Secretary of State I am informed receives $4,500 per annum.

Mr. ALLISON. I said "with one exception."

Mr. CAMERON. And the Assistant Secretaries of the Interior receive $4,000, and of the Treasury $4,500.

Mr. ALLISON. . The Assistant Secretaries of State until a few years ago—until 1881—received but $3,500.

Mr. CAMERON. Now it is $4,500 for the First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. ALLISON. Then, for the purpose of securing a competent person whom it was understood would accept the office if the salary was increased, an addition of $1,000 was made to the salary of the First Assistant Secretary of State. Last year I think we provided for an additional Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CAMERON. At $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. At $4,000. But I only desired now to call attention to the fact that if this salary is fixed at $4,500 for the assistant Secretary of the Navy—and I think it is not an excessive salary—we shall be called upon and in fair dealing ought to increase the salaries of the existing assistant secretaries of the other Departments.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me a word on that very point. Some examination was made by the Committee on Naval Affairs into this subject of the salaries of assistant secretaries in the different Departments. I do not know that it was an exhaustive examination; but the statutes were looked up, and we found, rather to my surprise, that most of the assistant secretaries in the different Departments by one bill and another that has been passed pertaining to those Departments are as high now as $4,000. There are only two or three that we found are left at the old rate of $3,500, and instead of fixing this at $4,500 the committee took the intermediate rate of $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I only spoke from memory, but I venture to state that the First Assistant Secretary of State and the new Assistant Secretary of the Interior are the only two officers now acting as assistant secretaries who receive a higher compensation than $3,500.

I do not criticise this salary of $4,000. I think it is necessary to have a competent man, if we have any man in this office as assistant Secretary of the Navy, a man competent to discharge the duties of Secretary when the Secretary is absent; but I also believe that the assistant secretaries in other Departments should have the same salary if we apply that salary here.

Mr. CAMERON. That is another question.

Mr. ALLISON. It is another question, but it is a question that ought to be considered, I think, in connection with this bill. I desired to call attention to it at this moment.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, there was until last year but one assistant secretary that had $4,500, and that was made $4,500 for a special case, and the place was not accepted by the person for whom that $4,500 salary was provided.

Mr. INGALLS. What assistant secretary was that?

Mr. DAWES. That was the First Assistant Secretary of State. There was a desire on the part of the officials to obtain special service in that Department, and it was supposed it could be obtained by raising the salary from $3,500 to $4,500; but in that they were mistaken. Still the salary of that office has remained, although filled in the ordinary way, at $4,500. When we created the new Assistant Secretary of the Interior, last March, I believe, his salary was put at $4,500, but I am not certain.

Mr. ALLISON. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. DAWES. It may have been $4,000.

Mr. HALE. I have the statute right here. In the Department of State the First Assistant Secretary receives $4,500, the others $3,500. In the Treasury Department each of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury receives $4,500. I thought it was $4,000, but I see it is $4,500.

Mr. INGALLS. How many are there?

Mr. HALE. Two. In the Department of the Interior the Assistant Secretaries receive $4,000. So I do not discover any others than the two lower assistants in the State Department who get $3,500.

Mr. DAWES. There is no desire, so far as I know, to make the salary more than $4,000. I think $4,000 is a proper salary for this officer. I do not think $3,500 is enough. The lowness of the salary provided was the reason why the office was not filled when it was created. The services of a person competent for that place can not be obtained for that figure.

Mr. BECK. This bill fixes $4,000 for this salary. Four thousand dollars perhaps will secure a competent man; and if it does, well. There must be a very competent man to fill the place properly.

Mr. DAWES. I heartily agree with the bill. I think it is necessary, and I think such an assistant is also necessary in the War Department. It is necessary for reasons which have already been suggested that the War Department and the Navy Department should be lifted as much as possible in their administration out from under the Army and the Navy, so that the Secretary, who is a civilian, shall have an opportunity to impress his views upon the Department and be responsible for its work, and so that whenever he is necessarily absent it may not fall back into the influences and under the control of the Army or Navy. I do not say that with a disposition to criticise that policy, but only that he thereby is relieved often of responsibility for the changes of policy and changes of administration that happen the moment any person from the Army or the Navy has to act in the capacity of head of either of those Departments. It will be necessary that somebody do the duties of an assistant secretary, and the only question is whether he shall be from the Army or Navy or from civil life. I think there is every reason in the world why he should be from civil life.

I hope with the Senator from Connecticut that there is to be something more done toward rehabilitating the Navy than has been done heretofore. If there has been in the past any wisdom of statesmanship in putting off that duty until the execution of that policy could come into different hands, I have nothing to say upon that point. It has now fallen into different hands. I am willing to do whatever is in my power to aid them in any disposition they may have to do that which I think they ought to have permitted to be done years before.

Mr. HALE. I find on looking further that each of the assistants in the Post-Office Department, places corresponding to this, receive, not $3,500, but $4,000, and that is the salary of the assistant Attorneys-General. So the only assistants remaining that receive $3,500, as I stated at first, are the two minor assistants in the State Department. All the rest receive either $4,500 or $4,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I made no point about the salary.

Mr. HALE. No; I was only answering some other suggestions which were made by other Senators.

Mr. ALLISON. I made the suggestion, and on looking further I find that the very thing we did some years ago resulted in increasing the salaries of nearly all these assistants to $4,500. When we increased the salary of the First Assistant Secretary in the State Department, that at once required us to increase all the others.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not object to the salary. I am willing to vote all the money that may be necessary for administration, but I object to the creation of this office as unnecessary. It is often convenient to have an assistant on whom a responsibility, disagreeable to his chief, may be thrown. There have been abundant such instances during the last few years, and will likely be more in the future.

I am opposed to that method of administration not only in regard to this—because my opposition to this is not different from that which I have assumed at all times—but I believe in making the head of the Department responsible for everything that occurs in it, and I do not want to put any more scape-goats in the Navy Department or any other Department than there are now. If the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War desires means of collecting information, desires expert skill or anything of that kind for the purpose of enabling him to form a judgment, give it to him; but if it is for the purpose of enabling somebody else to form a judgment for which he is not responsible, then I object.

But the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], hoping that we shall do better than we have done heretofore in this Navy business, thinks that the Democratic party now are going to be willing to build up the Navy as they have not heretofore been willing to do. Taking as a sample what has been done during the few months this Administration has been in power I doubt if more will be done than heretofore, and what has been done so far does not inspire me with the confidence I would like to have, and I think best to stand just where we are for the present.

I do not think it is necessary, in order to build up a navy, that we shall break down old and responsible and reputable contractors who are to build our ships if they are to be built with the requisite skill. I do not observe that the present Secretary of the Navy has needed any help in the direction he has already gone. He undertook the completion of four ships of the Navy, including a dispatch-boat, and for this purpose took them out of the hands of the contractor, whom he first ruined. That job he completed; the ships are still on hand uncompleted. No assistant secretary could have aided him in what he has done. His work has been perfect of its kind. I am willing that the responsibility of all future transactions shall rest upon him. I am not willing to put any person in his office who shall divide that responsibility with him or upon whom it can be cast at a convenient moment.

When I say that of the Secretary of the Navy, it is not of him personally, but it applies to all the Departments alike. There is too much of this divided responsibility. It is not an assistant Secretary of the Navy that is needed, but men of skill and experience, who can be had as needed, and whom it will be better to change at intervals.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend by striking out the word "shall," in line 3, and inserting "may;" so as to read: "That the President may appoint in the Navy Department," &c.

Mr. CAMERON and Mr. HALE. No objection to that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, if my recollection serves me, this is the first attempt on the part of the opposition to this Administration to force—probably not to force, because I do not know the attitude of the Administration toward gentlemen—but to attempt to make them have an additional officer at a large salary. Before we commence—because I think this is the commencement—we should understand whether this is entirely acceptable to the Administration now in power. I know it is not in conformity with their expressed desires in their platform and speeches. I know it is not in conformity with our platform and speeches. It stands in antagonism to the attitude of both the great political parties of this country and the expression of the wishes of the people of this country, because when they sought in the exercise of sovereign power to change administrations the people believed it was to be in the interest of reform and in the interest of economy. Now, if the Administration or the Secretary of the Navy does not desire this, the chance is that they may be a little suspicious of the Greeks, though bearing gifts. I am not willing to place the Administration in that attitude.

I only judge from the advocates of this measure on this floor, I only judge from the members of the committee who have expressed so much anxiety on the subject, and I desire to put our friends on the other side on their guard. The advocates of this measure seem to be among the political opponents of the Administration, and therefore it is that it is proper, I think, that I should make the suggestion, so that they may not be entrapped into accepting this office with this salary.

We have heard much about this matter. It is perfectly evident, I think, to the ordinary comprehension of Senators, or at all events of the people, that this office is not really needed, because the Government has been administered many years without it; and if we have got on without it, certainly there can be no necessity for it. I remember that only a little while ago there were discharges from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. They were reducing then the force of men in the employ of the Government. That reduction, however, was confined to men who received a dollar per day, I think—laborers; and therefore it threw upon the laborers retained the necessity of performing that which the discharged men had performed; and yet without apparently any necessity, with no increase of business, we are asked now to establish an office whose salary will be about equivalent to the pay of fifteen discharged laborers.

Our friends in front, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the distinguished chairman of the important Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], a distinguished member of the same committee, insist that this office shall be created, as I understand them, and while making a suggestion about the salary, they indicate that it is impossible to reach out and obtain competent men to discharge this duty at $3,500 per year, and then, of course, from the intimations dropped, all the other assistant secretaries are to be raised up to $4,000 or, if necessary, to $4,500. I do not understand the expression of the Senator from Maine, "the minor assistant Secretaries in the State Department." I do not see any warrant in law for speaking of an assistant secretary as a "minor" assistant. They are all assistant secretaries, raised to the dignity of the office, and they will need the dignity of the pay.

We are told that there was difficulty in finding some one to fill the place—the old story we hear whenever a bill is proposed to increase salaries or make new offices. Then we are reminded of the difficulty of obtaining men to fill the place. So we hear of a distinguished gentleman, who was looked for to be Assistant Secretary of State, who could not think of touching that office unless the salary was made $4,500. The increase was made, but it seems $4,500 was not a sufficient inducement for him to take the office, and then our friends say that $3,500 only is paid to the assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Now, I would ask Senators if they are aware that this Administration when making changes were embarrassed in finding competent men to fill the office of assistant Secretary of the Treasury? The Senator from Iowa, I presume, did not intend that his remarks should receive that construction, because, if so, there was no difficulty. The Treasury Department was filled by very competent assistants. They were trained men; they were competent men; they discharged their duties without fault, because the new Secretary kept them in his household when he had the power to remove them but did not; so that the ability and the competency of those gentlemen was indorsed not only by the previous but by the present Administration. They were receiving $3,500 a year, and I think that neither of the assistant Secretaries of the Treasury was anxious, even at that pittance, to drop out on the change of administration, but they were perfectly willing to serve their country under a Democratic Administration and without any increase of salary. So there was no difficulty on that score. This pictured embarrassment certainly does not exist in this matter of assistant secretaries.

I only desired now to pause long enough to emphasize this proposition. It will be repeated. You may discharge the laborers at $1 a day in any of the Departments, to be followed by the increase of assistant secretaries at $4,000 a year. Therefore it is that right at the beginning of this sort of reform I desired to call to it the attention of the Senate and of the country.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, it occurs to me that there can be but one opinion as to the advisability of introducing more civil influence as in contradistinction to naval influence in the administration of this Department. I, as a member of the committee from which this bill has been reported, favor it, and I do so among other reasons for the very one which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] assigned as his reason for opposing it. I do not want to relieve the Secretary of the Navy from one atom of the just responsibility which under the law rests upon him to-day; upon the contrary, I want to rivet and fasten that responsibility upon him to the fullest measure possible. The question is whether this bill does not accomplish that purpose among other good purposes which I think it embraces.

It is practically impossible that the Secretary of the Navy should either be present all the time in his office in the discharge of the duties that pertain to it, or that he should be able to meet all the duties that rest upon the head of that Department and in his own person discharge all the functions pertaining to its management. That we know; and among the most lamentable instances that we are to note occurs this to me: From the sheer impossibility of meeting all these obligations and discharging all these duties we see to-day one of the most important functions of this great Department lodged in the hands of a naval officer—the matter of detail. The bureau of detail is to-day not in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy except for the purpose of revision, but practically it is in the hands of a naval officer, and he a captain, and the twelfth captain on the list; and yet there is not an officer of the American Navy, including its Admiral, whose details are not made by this subordinate officer.

It does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Kansas to comment upon it from a political standpoint, nor does it lie in my mouth to make such a comment, because it is the practice of the Administration to-day, and it has been the practice of the present Secretary's predecessors in office. I do not blame his predecessors for doing it; I do not blame the present Secretary for the practice, for, as I have stated, I am convinced that it is a physical impossibility for him to discharge all the routine duties incident to the office which he holds. Now, sir, it seems to me that the responsibilities of the Secretary would be intensified and clinched and riveted if you give him an officer from civil life, of his own selection, not only for whose acts but for whose selection and appointment he, and he alone, is responsible.

Is it a proper thing to see the twelfth captain of the line in the Navy issuing orders of detail for cruises and sea-service to every officer in that Department up to his superior, the Admiral? Yet we find that that is the practice to-day and has been under former administrations, and for the reason I have assigned, that it is demonstrated to be a physical impossibility for either of this officer's predecessors or for himself to discharge all these duties and give personal supervision to every detail of machinery in the Department.

It seems to me, sir, that it would be far better for an officer taken from civil life to be charged with this very important function. In that way you would get rid of all the bickerings and all the jealousies that have been adverted to by Senators who have preceded me this morning. It is not fair to require an officer of the Navy to put himself in the position which this captain holds to-day. We know quite well that there are comparatively desirable and non-desirable assignments to duty. The officer who gets the better place surely will not undertake to protect the officer acting in the details from the criticisms that will come upon him from the friends of those who have failed.

I do not mean to reflect upon the administration of Captain Walker as the head of this bureau of detail. His competency and efficiency are known and admitted of all men. His honesty of purpose it is not my desire to impugn. It is not that; I have no criticisms to pass and no complaints to make as to the manner in which the officer discharges this important function. I am trying to call the attention of the Senate to the evil that exists, and the only proper remedy, as it seems to me, which is presented to us, and that is, without relaxing one atom of your demands for the responsibilities that attach to the head of the Department, but even fastening them more closely and more firmly upon him, let him have the power to call from civil life an assistant secretary of this Department, and let that assistant secretary take charge, for instance, of this very duty of the detail of officers of the Navy and relieve a subordinate officer of the naval service from such an important trust.

I can not tell what special objection may be assigned bearing on the creation of this office—an assistant secretary of this Department. The Postmaster-General has three assistants; the Treasury Department has two; the Interior Department has two; the State Department has three; and why not let there be two civil officers in this Department, if you mean to infuse any civil influence into its administration at all?

I myself heartily approve the bill, and believe that it is not only in the direction of good administration, but that it is the only means which can be adopted to make efficient the administrative policy that you have determined a civil officer shall bring into existence in the conduct of this Department of the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I intend to treat this Administration with absolute justice. Whatever assistance any officer of any Department may certify that he requires, whatever moneys he may say are, in his judgment, essential to the proper administration of his Department, I shall vote to supply. But I do not propose to place myself in the attitude, as one member of the majority in this body, of tendering to that Administration any assistance they do not themselves certify that they require or any moneys that they do not themselves aver are necessary for carrying on their Departments.

Mr. CAMERON. This has been requested by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. INGALLS. I have not yet heard any public declaration from any member of the party which supports this Administration and to which it is accredited that the Secretary of the Navy has stated that this officer is necessary and that he requires additional assistance.

Mr. BUTLER. The Secretary of the Navy has recommended it.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us have his request read.

Mr. BUTLER. On page 40 of his report—

The system of organization——

Mr. INGALLS. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. BUTLER. From the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The system of organization indicated herein begins with the Secretary (who occupies a position at the confluence of all the powers confided to the Department), and supports him with some aids or advisers in such number and of such character as shall seem judicious; (an assistant Secretary of the Navy would seem to be an essential feature.)

Mr. INGALLS. That is a remarkably emphatic declaration!

Mr. BUTLER. Modest.

Mr. INGALLS. Very modest!

Mr. BUTLER. But nevertheless emphatic and quite sufficient for the ordinary intellect.

Mr. INGALLS. It would seem to be under all the circumstances not very emphatic. Let that be quoted again, so that I may not misapprehend it.

Mr. BUTLER. If I can be assured of silence while reading I will read it again.

An assistant Secretary of the Navy would seem to be an essential feature.

Mr. INGALLS. A very guarded statement! I wish the Senator would send me that book.

Mr. BUTLER. I had not quite finished reading what I desired.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no! I send the report to the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. And the most amusing feature about this all is—to which my attention had not been called—that the paragraph that the Senator has read appears to be an interpolation and is in parenthesis.

Mr. CONGER. Not necessary to make sense.

Mr. INGALLS. Not only not necessary to make sense, but evidently it was an afterthought.

The system of organization indicated herein begins with the Secretary (who occupies a position at the confluence of all the powers confided to the Department), and supports him with some aids or advisers in such number and of such character as shall seem judicious;

Then comes a semicolon, and after that in parenthesis appear the words:

(an assistant secretary of the Navy would seem to be an essential feature.)

Mr. BUTLER. Of the Department.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir, in the system of organization, not in the discharge of the duties; not that any additional assistance is required, for we have no navy; it has been said iterum iterumque that we had no navy, and the hope has been expressed from time to time that the patriotism of the Democratic party would rise to the exigency of the occasion and give us a navy. I believe the Tallapoosa has been raised and is now in process of repair; but if there has been any enormous increase in the labors and duties which devolve upon this Department under the appropriations or legislation of the last two years I shall be very glad to hear from the Committee on Naval Affairs in what it consists and how the burdens of the Secretary of the Navy have been increased, so that we should be called upon to force upon them, in defiance of their repeated declarations that this was an administration based upon reform and economy in the public service, an additional officer which the Secretary of the Navy says is an essential feature of the system, or rather would seem to be an essential feature of the system, but which he does not intimate is at all necessary for the purpose of discharging the duties of that office.

Sir, I should have been much better contented if the Committee on Naval Affairs instead of busying themselves to find some method of conferring new patronage and new offices upon this Department had endeavored to make some satisfactory inquiry into the conduct of the administration of the Department in connection with our naval construction and in connection with the transactions by which attempt after attempt has been made to reject the Dolphin. I can not forget, nor can the American people forget, that a studious attempt has been made on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to crush out a great American enterprise; that in pursuance of a predetermined plan one of the greatest industrial establishments in this country was forced into bankruptcy; that an American citizen whose life had been devoted to the interest of the American marine was compelled to suspend his operations upon the pretext—I repeat it, sir, the pretext—that the Dolphin, which had been constructed in accordance with the designs and under the direction of the officers of the Navy Department, was structurally weak and unfit for acceptance, and when one attempt under the operations of the board that was organized for the purpose of declaring that that ship was not fit for service had failed another was organized, another attempt was made to show that this vessel was structurally weak, and when that failed I am told that another was organized and the Dolphin was again sent out in search of a cyclone which it encountered off Cape Hatteras, where the waves were so high and the winds were so tempestuous that the experts had to go below sea-sick, and still she outrode the gale and came into port without any indications of structural weakness. And I understand that at last all hostile efforts having failed, by some subterranean arrangement that is kept out of sight, no public notice having been given, this Secretary of the Navy has decided that the Dolphin can not be rejected; that she was constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications, and that, therefore, the effort which crushed John Roach, threw three thousand men out of employment, and closed one of the great industrial enterprises of this country, was a gross, unwarranted, and abominable wrong.

I confess, sir, I am not in the mood of handing out on a salver any additional patronage or any additional emoluments to the Secretary of the Navy, which he is only able to certify in parenthesis are essential apparently to the perfection of a system of organization. It is barely possible that if the Secretary of the Navy had had an assistant from civil life appointed by President Cleveland he might have been so far re-enforced in his herculean efforts to reject the Dolphin that the attempt would have been successful.

Therefore, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I see no occasion for the adoption of this measure. I see no warrant for it. I see no justification for it. The duties of this office have been for years discharged without this assistance, and it will certainly puzzle the most active of all the champions of this Administration to tell us where the burdens and duties of that officer have been increased by any legislation or by any expenditure or by any increased operations in the direction of rendering the Navy more efficient.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, it is remarkable that the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] should have made a speech of the character he has when his side of the Chamber control the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs and control the legislation of this Senate; and if the statements he has made are true he is failing to discharge a solemn duty he owes to his State and to the people of the United States in his failure to demand an investigation of the matters connected with the Dolphin.

Mr. INGALLS. They will be investigated. Do not be uneasy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not have the investigation before an attempt is made to create a false impression in regard to the facts? The Secretary of the Navy did simply his duty, nothing more and nothing less than his duty, in attempting to have a Government contractor comply with the law, and the Secretary of the Navy will not avoid an inquiry into that matter. Let it be investigated. That is all we ask. Let there be an investigation of that conduct and let the world know the facts in the case.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I can not say from my personal knowledge of the condition of that Department that an assistant secretary is absolutely necessary. I remember very distinctly that the late Secretary of the Navy before the Committee on Appropriations convinced us very conclusively that an assistant Secretary of the Navy was necessary; and so did the late Secretary of War as to his Department, and we authorized the appointment. I voted for it, although I am not inclined to vote for an increase of the number of officers of this Government. I much prefer voting for a decrease whenever an opportunity offers; but we thought it was necessary.

I did not know that this measure was coming up and do not know what information the Committee on Naval Affairs had in regard to the necessity for it. But I desire to say to the distinguished Senator from Kansas and the distinguished Senator from Nebraska that they must remember the condition of the Departments when they were transferred to the new Administration on the 4th day of last March. They were taken in the condition they were in. I am not bringing this up for the purpose of any censure on any one. I will commence with the Interior Department, over which the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] presided so ably. I simply want to show the condition the Administration was in when it was received on the 4th day of last March, and every Senator will see from that condition that there ought to be some change, if possible.

The Senator from Colorado will bear me out, I think, in the statement that in his Department, the Interior Department, the business of administration was far behind. Take the Land Office; the current business was eighteen months behind, I will say. I believe it was further behind when the Senator first took charge of the Department. If my recollection serves me, it was probably nearly two years behind then. I think he brought it nearer up to date. It was the same way in other branches of the service. Take the Pension Office, and that is behind with its business. Now go to the Treasury Department, where all the accounts and expenditures are audited and adjusted, and there in the office of the Second Auditor, the office where the balances of the bounty and back pay to soldiers, their widows and their orphans, are examined and adjusted, the business was two years behind.

I say, and I say it without any reflection upon any one—because this business has accumulated and piled up from year to year; it never has been taken hold of in my opinion in the way it should be and brought up to date—it is a burning shame that the balances due the soldiers, their widows and their orphans, should after twenty years from the close of the war be unadjusted and unsettled. A change is needed; what that change ought to be is an entirely different question. Whether it must be by an increase in the clerical force, or whether it must be by placing greater responsibility upon certain officers of the Departments. I am not competent just now to say; but something is needed. A change is needed. What is needed is to bring the business up to date; the change needed is to bring all the business of the Departments up to date.

What is the result and what is the effect? Every Senator here is flooded with letters from claimants for pensions. Why? Because they can not get their letters answered from the Departments. Every Senator is flooded with letters in regard to back pay and bounty. Why? Because they can get no satisfaction from the Second Auditor's office. So it is with claims for horses pending before the Third Auditor, and so it is with claims for quartermaster and commissary stores pending before the Commissary-General and the Quartermaster-General.

The Administration has been taken in this condition, and it will not do for gentlemen to commence criticising quite so early yet; it has had no opportunity yet. I do not know whether it will make changes for the better or not. Give it an opportunity. If an assistant Secretary of the Navy is needed in order to bring the departmental business of the Navy Department up to what it ought to be, the Secretary ought to have that help. If it is for the purpose merely of creating a new office and giving patronage, I am as much opposed to it as the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Nebraska; but I do not understand that that is the object. I understand from the members of the committee that the Secretary of the Navy desires it.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interpose right there?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator mentioned the fact that under the prior Secretary the Committee on Appropriations was convinced that an assistant secretary was needed in this Department. I was on the committee, and I recollect very well that at the time we agreed to it it was in the early stages of the administration of the then Secretary of War and the then Secretary of the Navy, and afterward when they got the run of the office they both declined to appoint an assistant secretary.

Now, what I want to call the Senator's attention to is this: Whether it may not be that the same influences inside both these Departments that induced these two Secretaries to recommend an assistant may have been at work now for the purpose of bringing about certain things; for instance—I do not say it is so, but I merely call the Senator's attention that he may reflect about it—it may be much easier for officers of the Navy to control an assistant Secretary of the Navy than it is to control a Secretary. I will not say what controlled the two Secretaries in their refusal afterward to appoint an assistant; I merely call the Senator's attention to the fact that they did not do it, although we passed a law authorizing it. Neither of them nominated or sent to the Senate an assistant. Without, as I said, saying why they did not, I merely throw the suggestion out, that Senators may reflect and make a little inquiry before this is done, to see whether the Secretary of the Navy means to say that he absolutely needs this officer in transacting the business of that Department. If he does, I will vote for it; if he does not, I will not. I am opposed to it as I understand it now from my former information; but if the Secretary absolutely needs it that is another thing; he does not say so.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator is correct in regard to the passage of the act authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of War and an assistant Secretary of the Navy. It was early in the administration of the late Secretaries of the Navy and of the War Departments, and I remember distinctly the discussion in regard to allowing those assistant secretaries. It was agreed, I believe almost unanimously, by the committee, from the representations we had, that they ought to have them. Now, I remember that time rolled on and no appointments were made, and the question came up about the time we repealed the law. I can not say how I got my information. I heard it mentioned at different times, "Why have they not appointed assistants?" I do not say from whom or how I got the impression, but my impression is just this, that for $3,500, which was the salary then allowed, neither one of them thought he could get a man of the character, ability, and firmness who could take the place there and resist the pressure that would be brought to bear.

Mr. LOGAN. It is well to put in about the salary; but the fact appears that those Secretaries did not turn over their own power and control to a man who might be appointed assistant secretary. It looked as if the very pressure that they were themselves afterward forced to resist was that which caused them to make the recommendation in the first place; and when they discovered it they did not make the appointment. Is not that true?

Mr. COCKRELL. My impression was just as I say, that they could not get for the price allowed the character of man needed. There may have been other reasons, but that was my understanding.

Mr. BUTLER. I intended to submit some observations; but if we can have a vote, I am willing to give way.

Mr. CAMERON. It is but three minutes to 2 o'clock, and I think a vote can be had.

Mr. LOGAN. There will not be any vote taken now.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to say in answer to the question of the Senator from Illinois, that the Secretary of the Navy inclosed a copy of this bill to me in a letter three or four days ago, asking me to present it in the Senate and giving his reasons for it, and stating that he needed the services of an assistant. That letter is not now in my possession, but he wrote a similar letter to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives. I have sent over for that, and it will probably be here in a few minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I had no idea of participating in this debate; but for fear my remarks may be construed into indifference as to this appointment, I simply desire to say that in my judgment the appointment of this officer is extremely essential and very important for the proper administration of the Navy Department. It was so decided by the Committee on Naval Affairs after very full consultation, and it seems to me, notwithstanding the severe remarks of the Senator from Kansas as to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, that they are as full and explicit and complete as he could possibly make them. It strikes me so.

Those of us who have been upon the Committee on Naval Affairs have realized and appreciated fully the difficulties surrounding the Secretary of the Navy in dealing with that immense organization, and all of us have felt that some very decided material changes in the organization were necessary in order to have a more effective Navy. Indeed, this is one of the initial points to accomplish that end. It has been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. The wants of the Government seem to demand it. I therefore can see no earthly reason why Congress should not grant this additional officer.

I will say to the Senator from Kansas that I do not think it is an act of kindness to Mr. John Roach to have his name brought into this discussion, and the real, true friend of Mr. Roach would refrain from interjecting his name into a discussion like this. At a proper time, on a proper occasion, when it is relevant to the subject under discussion, I think that I shall be able to say something upon that subject which will sustain me in the observation that I have just made. I see, sir, that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3160) to amend section 533 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 4378) to detach Hood County, Texas, from the Waco branch of the northern judicial district of Texas and attach the same to the Graham branch of said district, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4834) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, when I addressed the Senate first upon this bill I was not certain where the opposition to it would be placed. I was compelled, therefore, in view of what had been said at prior sessions of Congress in opposition to the admission of Dakota to take a somewhat wide range in the remarks which I made at that time. I congratulate myself and the Senate that the debate is now narrowed; that it is no longer necessary to shell the woods in order to locate the enemy, but that they have placed themselves, and we are now able to eliminate from the debate much that has been matter of discussion heretofore. And yet, though the opponents of this bill have abandoned many positions which they held with great courage in the earlier part of the debate, I do not find that the opposition itself has diminished. I do not find as yet any indication, though I hoped there might be some before the debate was over, that any Senator having been routed from position in which the opposition to this bill has previously located itself was now willing to surrender and to give to the people of Dakota their constitutional rights. The opposition seems to be as strenuous and to come from the same quarter as it did when the debate was placed upon other grounds.

Mr. President, I have endeavored ever since I have had any connection with this legislation—and that connection began in the Forty-seventh Congress—to meet every reasonable proposition that came from its opponents and to accommodate the bill to every sincere objection that was made to it. I have endeavored also in all that I have said, both in committee and here on the floor of the Senate, to refrain from any allusion to motives, from any charges against the opponents of this bill and from any imputation upon their sincerity in that opposition. I entered upon this discussion, as I expressly declared to the Senate, not only in the hope but in the belief that there were at least on the opposite side of this Chamber two or three minds open to a fair discussion of this question. I will not abandon the hope, though the belief has fled.

Mr. President, when Dakota first asked recognition as a State the opposition was put upon the ground that she had not sufficient population. It was said, "We are ready to admit her if she can make it plain that she has the requisite population, a population equal to the unit of representation in the lower House of Congress." At once I proposed that there should be incorporated into the bill a provision for a census, and a further provision that if the census did not reveal the presence of a sufficient number of people all proceedings under the enabling act should at once cease. Was I not entitled to expect that those who put their opposition upon the ground of a lack of population would support that proposition and put it to the test? But they did not. They were driven from that position simply to fall back to another.

It was said next in the course of this discussion that the question of division ought to be submitted to the people of the whole Territory, and it is still said. At the last session of Congress, when that argument came from the opposite side of this Chamber, I expressed then a willingness, if those who talked so would vote as they talked, that a proposition should be incorporated in the bill to submit the question of admission to a vote of the people of the entire Territory. Was I not entitled, if this objection was sincere, if the men who urged it were putting their opposition upon the true gronnd, to be met by these gentlemen upon that proposition with an amendment that should have settled forever the question whether the people of the whole Territory were in favor of division?

But no, Mr. President, I was met with an enabling act for the whole Territory; I was met with a proposition that Dakota might come into the Union if she would come in as one State. I am entitled to believe that when gentlemen in argument urge such objections and when their amendments are in a different direction and they fail to accept so fair a proposition, they are simply putting forward here objections which are not their real ground of opposition to this legislation.

At the last session of Congress I made in debate the following proposition; I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. President, I took occasion to say the other day, when addressing the Senate upon this subject, that if any Senators here felt that the expressed wishes of the people of Dakota upon the question of the division of the Territory would be influential with them on their votes upon this bill, I should not oppose a proposition to test the sentiment of the people of the present Territory of Dakota upon the question of division by a direct vote upon that question. I adhere to the proposition I made then, and if the Senator from Arkansas or any one feeling with him that the expressed wishes of the people of this Territory upon this question should be controlling, feeling with him that if there is a popular majority in the whole Territory in favor of this division, then Southern Dakota ought to be admitted as a State. If he, or any holding that view, will propose an amendment to this bill reported by the committee, providing that before a constitutional convention is assembled at all, the distinct question, ay or no, upon the division of this Territory upon the forty-sixth parallel shall be submitted to all the people and shall be voted upon, and that in case the vote shall be against division the convention provided for in this bill shall be called for the whole Territory, and in case the vote is in favor of division it shall be called for the southern half of the Territory I will not oppose it. On the other hand, Mr. President, I should be glad to see that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber were willing to meet us upon such a proposition. I should be glad to see it, because it would give some hope of the passage of the bill through the other branch of Congress.—Congressional Record, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, page 236.

Mr. MORGAN. What bill was that, allow me to ask?

Mr. HARRISON. It was the bill at the last session of Congress, providing an enabling act for South Dakota. It was met by an amendment from the Senator from Arkansas, the present Attorney-General, in the nature of an enabling act for the whole Territory.

Now, Mr. President, am I not justified in believing, when the friends of this measure make such a proposition and it secures no response whatever, that the gentlemen who urged then and urge now that this division ought not to take place because it is not in accordance with the wishes of the people, do not believe what they say and are not willing to put their opinions to a test?

We were met last session also with the objection that the people of South Dakota did not want admission into the Union.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the honorable Senator, if he will allow me, is aware that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] has an amendment to this bill pending now as a substitute which proposes to take the vote of the whole people.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand that the Senator's amendment proposes to take any such vote. It is an enabling act for the whole Territory of Dakota.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course it is.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly it is, and it is the same old Kansas proposition, "You can come in under the Lecompton constitution now, but if you reject that and put into your constitution a prohibition of slavery you must wait until you have got 93,000 people." It is the same old proposition of last session, not to submit the question in advance to the vote of the people, but to say to them, "You can come in now if you come in as a whole as one State; but if you reject this proposition, you shall begin de novo."

That is the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina. It is the same proposition I was met with at last session.

But I was saying another objection we met with was that the people of South Dakota did not want it; and my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whose absence to-day I very much regret, not only because he is himself a sufferer, but because it puts some limitations upon what I should otherwise say—the Senator from Missouri at the last session had been so fortunate as to get two or three letters from people living in South Dakota, two I think was the limit, one from a gentleman by the name of Richmond and another from a lady named Marietta Bones, and in order to satisfy the Senate that the people of South Dakota did not want to be admitted as a State he read those two formidable letters!

He pursues the same policy in the debate this session, gathering up a few letters and pouring them in upon the Senate in order to give Senators a correct idea of the popular sentiment in the Territory. Every one of these people from whom the Senator reads letters has been counted once. I must suppose that when the vote was taken they voted against the constitution; and if they did so they are part of that number of 6,000 that are recorded against it. Do Senators think that it strengthens their case to parade these individual expressions again before the Senate?

I once heard a celebrated theatrical manager say that there was one thing in the way of stage deception that the gallery gods would not stand, and that was to have the army of "supes" come around the second time. When they recognized the face of a fellow who had been on the stage once before that business had to be stopped. And yet just that stage deception these gentlemen are attempting to practice upon the Senate and the country. The persons in South Dakota who oppose this constitution have been counted once, and that is enough. We do not want this army of supes marched around again.

It was said in the Forty-seventh Congress that a Presidential election was pending, and that it was unseemly to hurry this new State into the Union, and thus add an uncertain element to the electoral college on the very eve of a great national contest. The suggestion was no sooner made than the friends of Dakota at once accepted it and inserted a provision in the bill that the constitutional convention should not assemble until after the election of 1884 had taken place; but did that make any friends? Did that bring anybody to the support of the measure? Not one; and now we hear the suggestion from the distinguished Senator from Alabama that Dakota shall wait until 1889, until another of these great transactions shall have taken place, until the Democracy have had one more chance to secure a Democratic succession. He suggests that as there were thirteen original States, and Dakota will be thirty-nine, it will be so appropriate in the centennial year of the Constitution to multiply the thirteen by three and show that each grandmother has a child at her knee. [Laughter.]

Another Presidential election must be passed before Dakota can receive the hand of fellowship from the Senator from Alabama. I ask him, I ask the country, how long shall 300,000 American citizens, as justly entitled as he or the people of his State to participate in the great decision of a Presidential election, be kept out in order that the chances of a Democratic succession may be increased or the power and influence of other States magnified?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator asks me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I say they ought to wait until they get the consent of more than 31,000 voters.

Mr. HARRISON. I will come to that presently, and I will give some Senators enough of that question before I am through with it. I will show the per cent. of votes in the Senator's own State at the last Presidential election and see how well equipped he is here to criticise this vote upon the constitution in Dakota. Another Presidential election, and it may be that some fanciful combination of figures will then induce the distinguished Senator from Alabama to think that she ought to stay out four years longer.

Mr. MORGAN. There is one that I would——

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield, of course, not to too frequent interruptions, but now and then.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Indiana evidently is a candidate for the Presidency, and he might have a chance to obtain the votes of the State, but I do not think he will ripen in four years.

Mr. HARRISON. If I ever should be, though I would not be at all certain that I might not justly claim the electoral vote of Alabama I would never expect to have it counted for me. [Laughter.]

I am passing in review now the objections that have been made. I want to see if I can not show gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that it has been the Atlanta campaign over again. Forced from one intrenchment, another is prepared behind. There is no yielding to argument, there is no willingness to meet this question upon its merits or to meet the concessions which have been offered by the friends of Dakota.

Mr. President, when a man urges one objection to me to a course of action and I compel him to abandon it himself and he falls back upon another, and, when that is taken from him, still back upon another, I am driven to the conclusion that he has not been disclosing in the argument the real ground on which his opposition rests.

The Yankton County bonds were made an objection at one term. The Senator from Missouri declaimed upon that as if the skirts of Missouri were clear of municipal repudiation. Mr. President, I shall never be, here or anywhere, an advocate or defender of repudiation; but I should not deal justly with those people if I did not say that, in refusing to pay those bonds, they believed they had a just defense to them, and, in the hands of the first holders, I have no doubt they had. A railroad corporation had asked a subsidy. The people of Yankton County had voted it as a donation. Congress was then appealed to, and an act was passed by Congress changing the character of this affair and making it a subscription by the county to the capital stock of the railroad. The contract was changed without their consent and the railroad corporation did not comply with the terms of the subscription.

We were treated yesterday by the Senator from Alabama to something new in this debate. The Senator clothed himself with the judicial ermine; he was here as a judge, and no consideration that was not proper to influence a judge upon the bench should find lodgment in his mind. Mr. President, I never knew how absolutely impregnable the claims of Dakota were until I heard the speech of the Senator from Alabama. I never could appreciate before the stress that was upon those who opposed her admission. The Senator starts out with declaring that in the organic act of Dakota there is a provision which expressly prohibits the people residing in that Territory from suggesting any change in the bounds thereof. The provision he read was as follows:

Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said Territory into two or more Territories in such manner and at such times as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion thereof to any other Territory or State.

And he says that was a limitation upon the power of the people and of the Territorial Legislature. Why, Mr. President, it was a proviso inserted as a reservation of power in Congress upon that subject. It was not a limitation upon the people of the Territory. It did not say what they might or might not do. It was as utterly useless there as if the space had been left blank where those words are written. But if it is capable of any use, it is the use that in that organic act it was expressly contemplated by the Congress of the United States that this Territory should be divided. It was thought necessary to say that the bounds then fixed for the Territory of Dakota should not be held to be definite bounds, but that Congress might at any time change them.

I shall come presently to discuss the question whether there is any limitation upon the power of the people respectfully to propose anything to Congress. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say yesterday, though I do not find it in his reported remarks, that the people of Dakota could not petition Congress to do this thing because it was contrary to law.

Mr. MORGAN. I never said anything of that sort. My remarks are all in the RECORD as I delivered them.

Mr. HARRISON. That was the understanding I got at the time.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has made a very serious mistake about the first proposition he made as to my speech. It lies open before him. There it is.

Mr. HARRISON. It is very possible that I made a mistake. I think it is an error into which almost any one would fall who attempted to follow the line of argument urged by the Senator from Alabama. It is quite open to misconstruction. Certainly I have not intended to misconstrue it, and I was greatly amazed when I made a note of the remark of the Senator yesterday as I understood it, that by reason of this limitation the people could not ask Congress to do anything else, and I am glad to hear him disavow any such sentiment.

Mr. MORGAN. I never denied the right of petition to the people of Dakota or any other people; but I deny utterly that any body can form itself within that Territory as a Legislature or convention for the purpose of breaking down boundaries fixed by Congress without first getting the consent of Congress to do it.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to know whether the position of the Senator is that all these proceedings of the Legislature and the convention amount merely to a proposition to be admitted in the Union?

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad the Senator has called my attention to that matter, and, if he will excuse me, I will not now digress from the line of my argument to answer it, but will answer it very fully in a few moments.

What was another objection of the Senator from Alabama? He read a provision of the organic act that no member of the Legislature should be chosen to any office created by the Legislature, and then he asked me whether there were not some of the members of that Legislature in the constitutional convention. He had not any information on the subject himself at all. He thought that it was my duty as chairman of the Committee on Territories to go through the list of the men composing that body and search out their personal and official antecedents and see whether any of them were subject to any disqualification to sit in the convention.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I stated in my argument yesterday that I had information that there were thirteen of them.

Mr. HARRISON. I was coming to that. If the Senator will only have patience I will myself reach some of these things.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has just said that I had no information, whereas I stated to the Senate that I had information.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator first said he had none and appealed to me for information, and then he did say that he had information that there were fifteen, as I understood. I want to say to the Senator that I have information that there was not one.

Mr. MORGAN. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is glad to hear it. Now, Mr. President, is this a candid way of dealing with Dakota, to hunt out a personal disqualification of a small fraction of the convention that framed the constitution, even if it existed? If there were fifteen there would it invalidate the proceedings? And yet I am told by a gentleman from Dakota who ought to know that there was not one there.

Mr. MORGAN. I am told by a gentleman from Dakota who says he does know that there were thirteen or fifteen, I forget which.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator give me his name?

Mr. MORGAN. You have not given the name of your man.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand from Judge Moody and from another gentleman whose name I do not now recall, but I talked with him.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand so from Mr. Johnson, a man quite as respectable.

Mr. HARRISON. Exactly; I will come to Mr. Johnson in this debate after a while.

Mr. MORGAN. You may make war on Mr. Johnson, but do not do it on me.

Mr. HARRISON. I make no war on anybody. I have not dragged into this discussion the names of individual citizens of Dakota; but if they are brought here I shall give the Senate before I get through some of their antecedents and present relations to this question. I will show the Senator from Democratic newspapers in the State of Dakota just the relation of Mr. Johnson to the Democratic party and to this question and whom he represents here.

So it is, Mr. President. The Senator from Alabama who last session talked so blandly and kindly about the admission of Dakota that he absolutely persuaded me that I could count, if not upon his vote, at least upon his candid and kind consideration of this bill, goes about looking up some question of personal disqualification in some member of the convention, and that, as I think, upon insufficient information.

Then the Senator does not like to adopt this constitution because he says we have to take with it the Senators who have been elected by the Legislature which was convened under it. "We have to take," Mr. President! What has the Senator or any other Senator here to do with the question as to who shall be the Senators from any State? We have to take the Senator and his colleague, and we do it agreeably and without protestation; we have to take the Senator from Missouri and his colleague, and why? Because they have been chosen by the Legislatures of their respective States. I can not understand why we should not deal in the same way with Dakota, unless there be some question of personal unfitness, which is put out of the question, because the Senator from Missouri has conceded to both the gentlemen who come here to represent Dakota when she shall be admitted the highest personal character. If these proceedings of Dakota have been such that we can approve them, then I submit it is for no Senator to say here that he objects to her demand because he has to take Senators whom her people have chosen.

What has been the history of all these transactions? The Senator from Alabama knows that when enabling acts have been passed for the Territories they have sent here with their constitutions their Senators to take seats in this body when the States should be admitted. Does he deny that Missouri did so under an enabling act? Does he not know that, having framed and adopted a constitution, when Missouri sent it to Congress for approval she sent with it two Senators to represent her on the floor of the Senate? The same thing has been repeated in the case of every State that has been admitted under an enabling act or without it, so far as I now recollect. Would the Senator have thought it quite in taste for any gentleman to have said, when Mr. Benton and his colleague came here and the constitution of Missouri was presented, "We will not accept this constitution because we have to accept Thomas H. Benton as a Senator? Would it have been accepted as a proper argument in any of those cases? And if not in those, why in the case of Dakota? As I say, it is the usual, almost the invariable, course. I think in the case of an enabling act it has been the invariable course for a State to go on and choose its State officers and its Senators; and in the case of California the memorial for the admission of that State was signed by John C. Frémont and another, Mr. Gwin, I think, as Senators from that State. It was through them that the appeal of California came to the Senate; and would the Senator from Alabama have deemed it right for Congress to have said, "We are embarrassed, because if we accept your constitution we are compelled to accept the Senators that you sent along with it?"

The Senator talks as if the question of the admission of these Senators was submitted by the bill to the Congress of the United States and to the approval of the President. That argument, I am afraid, is subject to misconstruction if I talk about it at all. What is there in the bill, I ask the Senator from Alabama, that remits to the House of Representatives or to the President the question of the admission of these Senators? It admits the State, and when the State is once admitted these Senators come here with their credentials and present them as other Senators do, and the Senate is then under the Constitution the judge of the election and qualification of these men. Yet with elaboration the Senator from Alabama discussed the question as if my bill remitted to Congress the question of the admission of these Senators. The bill admits the State, and when the State is once admitted it is a question for the Senate whether she has chosen Senators and whether they are properly avouched to this body in order to entitle them to seats.

What are the amendments which are now suggested from the other side of the Chamber? Do they run in line with the arguments which have been made? Not at all. The Senator from Missouri insists that we have no sufficient ground for knowing that the people of Dakota want division, and forthwith he introduces a bill that divides the Territory on the Missouri River and constitutes two Territories, without any provision for taking the opinion of the people of Dakota on the subject at all. The Senator from Alabama talks about a Cæsarian operation, about the rude mangling of this Territory, and yet the Senator from Missouri proposes an amendment that is to cut the Territory by a north and south line, as I affirm to-day, without the expression of a single convention of either party, without an expression from any popular assemblage of respectability or any body of respectable citizens for the proposition he advocates.

Congress is by the amendment asked to run the knife lengthwise through Dakota without asking the opinion of her citizens; and that proposition comes from gentlemen who insist that I have not sufficiently shown that the people want division on the forty-sixth parallel, and that the question should be remitted to them for decision. I ask Senators to look at the map of Dakota. I have a map here, colored so as to show the two States as they would be constituted under the bill of the committee, symmetrical in shape in every way, and adequate in area. Take the proposition of the Senator from Missouri and cut the State here [indicating], and I ask any Senator on the other side of the Chamber whether you have not marred the conformation of the States, whether you have not made shoestrings out of them, cutting the State in two upon its longest line instead of upon its shortest? Yet that proposition comes from a gentleman who has argued here upon the floor that the people of Dakota do not want division, and I suppose it is to be supported by some at least of his colleagues upon the strength of those arguments.

I have already shown what the other proposition was, that of the Senator from South Carolina. It is to admit the whole Territory as one State. He is not troubled then about the wishes of the people. He settles the question for them. He takes upon himself to say, "There is to be no division; you shall come in as one State." We listened by the hour to a discussion on that side of the Chamber as to what the wishes of the people of Dakota are upon this question, yet when Senators come to deal with the question by amendment they utterly ignore the wishes of the people and set up their own will.

When I asked for a bill of particulars as to those points in which the proceedings in Dakota in the formation of their State government differed from the precedents the Senator from Alabama mentioned one, and that was that the people of an organized Territory had never by their own act divided that Territory or organized a State within a part of its defined limits as a Territory. I suppose that is what he meant.

Mr. MORGAN. No, I meant exactly what I said. The Senator will find it in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me read what the Senator said, then. He said:

> No, sir; those Territories were never cut in two by the consent of one-half of their own people.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the point.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what the Senator said. I say to the Senator that the State of California was organized by its own people, cut out of the domain we got from Mexico by the vote of the people who lived within those lines without asking the consent of anybody who lived outside of the lines.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator refer to California?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; to California.

Mr. BUTLER. California was an independent organization before it ever applied for admission into the Union.

Mr. HARRISON. California was an independent State, the Senator from South Carolina says, like Texas?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I did not say that.

Mr. HARRISON. If not like Texas, then what?

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said it was an independent State.

Mr. BUTLER. No, not an independent State; I said it was an independent separate organization.

Mr. HARRISON. What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. BUTLER. I mean that it was a separate, independent organization.

Mr. HARRISON. Separate and independent from what?

Mr. BUTLER. From everybody. And then it was put under the control of a military governor—General Riley. That is what I meant.

Mr. HARRISON. California separate and independent from everybody?

Mr. BUTLER. At one time, so they claimed.

Mr. HARRISON. California was procured by us under the treaty with Mexico.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. It was a part of the domain we got from Mexico, and California had no independent political organization that was ever recognised by this Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I never said it had.

Mr. HARRISON. If you did not say that, then what did you say?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator does not want to understand it; let him go on.

Mr. HARRISON. The United States placed, as I say in the report, a military governor over it. It had no defined lines that the United States had ever assented to in any way in the world. It was governed by a military governor as a part of the territory acquired from Mexico, as I have shown in the report. It was not a political entity with which we treated at all. We dealt with it as a part of the public domain precisely as we might deal with New Mexico or any other part of that domain which had not previously been given even a civil organization. I showed, in my remarks in opening, the case of Iowa; but the Senator from Alabama could not have been attending, or he would not have made that remark.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to interrupt the Senator, with his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I find in the note in volume 1 of Poore's Constitutions and Colonial Charters this statement, which I take to be true:

> California was first discovered by the Spaniards in 1542, and they began to establish missions there in 1769. After the Mexican revolution, in 1824, it formed a province of that republic until 1846, when the inhabitants and emigrants from the United States established an independent government. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo brought it within the limits of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Precisely.

Mr. BUTLER. "And it was then governed by the commanding officer of the military force stationed there, acting as provisional governor." That is what I said. Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, I understand that very well.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what I said, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. But I do not understand that that supports the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina. California came to us under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. California may have done this, that, or the other as a Mexican State; what has that to do with the question? When it became a part of our territory we set over it a military governor. It became a military district and nothing more, and the people of that Territory, without any legislation by Congress as to what should be the bounds of that State, met together in convention, and those within certain bounds voted for a constitution and made it a State.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no doubt about that, but that does not touch the question I submitted.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I can not understand what the Senator's question has to do with the matter in debate.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state just what it has to do with it. If the Senator does not choose to understand the point, as a matter of course I can not compel him to do so. I simply stated, as he was passing, that California had had an independent organization in 1846. I give my authority. Now the question is between the author of this book and the Senator from Indiana, if he denies it. I take this to be true. I then stated that it came in under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, but that prior to that time the inhabitants of the Territory and the emigrants from the United States had organized an independent government. That is all I stated.

Mr. HARRISON. We do not need to waste time about this matter. I do not care what had been the condition of California prior to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. When that treaty was ratified by Mexico and the United States and California became a part of the public domain it had no government, it had no political organization or existence, it had no boundaries, and the people within certain boundaries prescribed by themselves organized a State.

Now, I pass from that to the State of Iowa. I said the Senator from Alabama could hardly have observed the case of Iowa or he would not have made that remark. Iowa in 1844 called a constitutional convention and formed a constitution and proposed to Congress certain boundaries, which carried her northern boundary up to the Minnesota River and down the Minnesota River to Fort Snelling and down the Mississippi River to her present southern boundary. That was only a part of the then Territory of Iowa. It was distinctly a case where the people residing within a part of the limits of an organized Territory did form a constitution and proposed that they should be admitted under it with smaller limits than those fixed in the Territorial bounds.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it interrupt the Senator to correct him right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, moderately. I do not want to make this a conversational talk, but I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will reserve what I have to say about Iowa.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble is if I should print this speech I should have to print much that is being said by others which I would not want to be responsible for, and yet I am always willing, and indeed I am usually helped by a moderate amount of interruption. As the Senator at least knows (whether I am helped by it or not) I am usually good natured in yielding, and I yield now if he thinks this is a more appropriate time.

Mr. BUTLER. I think perhaps the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension or I am, and it is simply in the interest of a correct statement of fact.

Mr. HARRISON. I should be very glad then to have the Senator make his statement.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has stated, and several other Senators have stated, that Iowa had no enabling act. I find in this same book, volume 1, what was called a supplementary enabling act for Iowa.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the date of it? Will the Senator tell me?

Mr. BUTLER. In one moment I will give the dates. First, I find the Territorial government of Iowa was established in 1838. Then I find the next is an enabling act approved March 3, 1845. Then I find an act of Congress in 1846, in the Twenty-ninth Congress, first session, defining the boundaries of Iowa. Then I find the constitution of Iowa in 1846, which appears to me to come along in regular sequence; and

I also find an enabling act for the State of Florida, which seems to have organized a constitution in 1838–'39. I simply state that. If it is incorrect I should be very glad if the Senator would correct me.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has either misconceived the statements of the book from which he reads or they are incorrect. I showed the Senate that Iowa first formed her constitution and State government on the 2d of April, 1844.

Mr. BUTLER. I remember that.

Mr. HARRISON. Very good. The history of the legislation that followed was this: She prescribed to herself the boundaries to which I have just referred. Congress rejected those boundaries, and proposed to Iowa admission with certain smaller boundaries. Iowa rejected those boundaries, and then again went on and called a constitutional convention and proposed her present boundaries, and was admitted into the Union.

Mr. BUTLER. That sustains exactly what the statement in this book says, that in 1845 Iowa received a supplementary enabling act, and in 1846, in pursuance of it, organized a constitution.

Mr. HARRISON. An enabling act proper antedates the action of the people in forming a State government, and, as I have shown, so far from being an enabling act, it was an act adopting the constitution and State government with certain limitations as to boundaries.

Mr. LOGAN. That was the act of admission.

Mr. HARRISON. That was the act. An enabling act, to be called so with any propriety, is something that antedates the formation of a constitution and State government; and in Iowa there was no such act; neither was there in the case of Florida. The Senators from Florida will bear me witness that the constitution of Florida, under which she was admitted to the Union, was formed six years before the passage of the act that admitted her to the Union.

Mr. BUTLER. I have never denied that. I make no question about that.

Mr. HARRISON. If anything is clear at all, it is that in the case of both those States there was no enabling act; that the initiative was taken by the people, and taken precisely as it has been taken in Dakota under the act of a Territorial Legislature calling the people together for that purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know whether any considerable number of citizens were affected by the change in the boundaries of Iowa.

Mr. HARRISON. That I can not tell. That is impossible for me to tell.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it not a fact that the territory between the varied boundaries was wholly uninhabited by white people and was only occupied by Indians?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not say that the Senator is strictly correct, and yet I have no doubt that he is approximately correct. That it embraced the bulk of the population that was then in the Territory of Iowa I have no doubt is true.

I may say to the Senate in passing that I am not a defender of the right of any Territory to divide itself. I do not insist that they can do any efficient or final act in that direction at all; but I am a defender of their right to propose to Congress any bounds they please, and within those bounds to organize a State government and constitution and submit it to Congress.

I would hardly go as far as the argument of some gentlemen on that side of the Chamber would lead them if they would follow the argument to its conclusion. I do not believe that Congress should submit it wholly to the wishes of the people of a Territory as to what the size of a State should be. On the other hand, in my report at the last Congress I expressly said that the question of the area of a State was one that affected public interests of a general nature, and that it was not a local question which we could wholly commit to the wishes of the people of a Territory.

The Senator from Missouri, as I had occasion to say once before, has what I think is a bad habit in debate—the habit of making a man of straw and dusting him about all over the Senate Chamber. I believe that in debate the combatants should get into the same arena, that they should define their propositions, and that debate should be closed upon them. It is the most innocent and the most useless business in which a man can engage to construct a man of straw and then exhibit his skill in buffeting it about and knocking it to pieces. And yet the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Missouri, both finding no adversary here, are driven out into the field of the pamphleteer or the newspaper in order to find one against whom to direct the most of the power of their assault. The Senator from South Carolina asked, "Was it ever heard in this Chamber before that a State could constitute itself without the consent of Congress?" Has the Senator heard anybody say it here?

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to know what this is, then, that the Senator is talking about.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall show the Senator what it is.

Mr. BUTLER. What is it?

Mr. HARRISON. What is it, Mr. President?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, what is it?

Mr. HARRISON. There is now only the present Territory of Dakota, with its bounds and its government officers appointed and assigned by the General Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator mean to say that they do not consider themselves a State?

Mr. HARRISON. That they do not consider themselves a State! Has this debate got to go in one ceaseless and unending round?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, let the Senator answer that question and keep himself down to the issue now. I beg the Senator to confine himself to the issue. He put a direct question to me, in response to what I had asked, if anybody had ever heard of the people of a Territory organizing themselves into a State without the authority of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator say who said it here on this floor or where it is claimed in any paper that is here?

Mr. BUTLER. If it has not been said by the Senator from Indiana, then all that he has said is nothing but froth from beginning to end, because upon the very face of the paper that he presents it says, "the State of Dakota." It has proceeded to exercise the very highest functions of sovereignty by claiming to elect United States Senators, judges, &c., and I say that proceeding which those people have attempted, in my judgment, has never been done before in the history of this country, except by the consent of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is sometimes unfortunate in the use of expressions. He was yesterday. I overlook another to-day, when he talks about what I have been saying being mere froth.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I did not state that; I say unless this is a State.

Mr. HARRISON. That does not help it much.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator can take it as he pleases.

Mr. HARRISON. I please to take it now without offense.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, sir, go ahead.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator gets up and bravely reads from a pamphlet in his hand containing the constitution of the State of Dakota and shows that it is called a State. Will the Senator tell me how it would be possible to have entitled that instrument? Would he have said "a proposed State, by the grace of God and the Senator from South Carolina?"

Mr. BUTLER. No, I should have preferred to say "by the grace of the Senator from Indiana."

Mr. HARRISON. Now see if we can not understand how this instrument should be drawn. A people assemble in one of the organized or unorganized Territories of the United States with a view of organizing a State government, framing a constitution, and submitting it to Congress. What would you call it?

Mr. BUTLER. I would rather the Senator would denominate it.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, sir, I would denominate it "the constitution of the State of Dakota." What else would you call it? If you said "the constitution of the proposed State of Dakota," and Congress should admit the State, you would have to call your constitutional convention together again to strike out the word "proposed."

Mr. GEORGE. I think the difficulty will be removed possibly by the idea that the constitution only speaks from the date at which the State is admitted into the Union.

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly, but it must be called the constitution of a State. What else will you call it?

Mr. BUTLER. Call it one thing when it is another. Is that the idea?

Mr. HARRISON. It must be called the constitution of a State or else it can never be admitted into the Union, for only States can be admitted. As I said before, if this nice dealing with phrases, these niceties of court etiquette are to be applied to the people of this great Territory, they would have to write in their constitution "the constitution of the proposed State of Dakota," and then when Congress had admitted them and they wanted to publish their constitution they would have to call the convention together again and strike out the word "proposed."

Mr. BUTLER. I think the whole trouble might have been obviated if the people of Dakota had waited for an enabling act from Congress. That would have obviated the whole of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, wait for an enabling act; and yet if Senators on that side of the Chamber whose States came here without an enabling act and who are States to-day by the very process and under the very same popular movements that have been initiated in Dakota will only recognize as sufficient here what has been efficient to make States for them, there will be no division on party lines on this bill.

I do not talk to any one in this stage of the debate about the necessity of an enabling act. The Senator from South Carolina does not insist that it is essential I am sure. He will not put himself against the great line of Democratic precedents and against the expressed opinions of the greatest Democrats that ever lived in this country in an unbroken line of expression in Congress that it was in the power of the people acting in their primary capacity to organize a State government and apply to Congress for admission.

Mr. BUTLER. For fear that I may be misunderstood, I will say to the Senator that I most certainly do take issue with him on this subject, and that in the observations I submitted the other day I showed that those precedents have no analogy whatever to this case.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Alabama said this was a judicial question. Let us see what sort of judges have sat upon it. The Democratic party was in power in this country for a long term of years. Most of the States came into the Union while the Democrats were in power, and this question was never once presented to a Democratic Congress that they did not by an overwhelming majority establish the right of the people to organize a State government and to apply for admission.

Mr. BUTLER. What was the vote in the case of Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not recall the figures now. I know it was close in the Senate, because the Democratic majority was small; but it was very large in the House; and that was the first case, the first precedent.

Now, I feel this way when these gentlemen talk about the value of precedents. With this long line of succession, when quite half the States that have come into the Union from a Territorial condition have come in without enabling acts, this question ought to be at rest. But when I lay before the Senator from South Carolina the expressions of the ablest Democrats who have ever sat in either branch of Congress and the action of Congress upon these subjects, oh! he says, precedents are of no value. The Senator from Alabama says we must not allow ourselves to be bound by precedents. If a judge should hold a certain line of precedents to be valid and binding in every case where his brother-in-law was to be benefited by the decision, and when the question came of giving the benefit of the same line of precedents to some one against his relative he should turn around and declaim against the precedents and declare that they were unsafe, I should suspect his judicial fairness.

I say again that nowhere in my report, nowhere in this debate has anybody announced the proposition that Dakota is a State or can become a State until Congress has passed some act recognizing her as a State. That is in the report. I announced it in my opening argument. No one has asserted any contrary view of the question; and in order to find an adversary the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from South Carolina had to go out into the field of the newspaper and the pamphleteer. I objected to the Senator from Missouri having a gladiatorial contest here with Hon. Hugh J. Campbell, of Dakota, because Mr. Campbell could not get into the same arena where the Senator from Missouri was.

I always felt that if there was to be a fight there ought not to be a fence between the people who wanted to engage in it; and yet the Senator from Missouri, finding no advocate here of the doctrine that Dakota is a State or can become a State until Congress has passed some law recognizing her as a State, has gone out of the Senate to find one.

It is well enough to bear in mind in this connection that Congress can not make a State. I should like to see the Senator from South Carolina or the Senator from Missouri set about making a State by a law. We can frame no State constitution. We can set up no State government. Congress may, either in advance or by an act of ratification, approve what the people have done; but Congress can not make a State any more than it can unmake one. The authority of a State constitution and organization rests upon the sure foundation of the popular will. Mr. President, what is the use of all this vain discussion? Here are two concurrent things that must be done. First, the State constitution must be formed. Who can do it? The people who are to live under it, and no other hand can intermeddle in the work. Congress can not do it. What is the other efficient act to constitute a State of the American Union? It is recognition by Congress of the existence of the State.

These two things must concur before a State can exist, and the simple question here is, is the initiative in that movement necessarily with Congress? I say it is not. Two bodies are to act, Congress and the people, and all I contend for here to-day is that it is competent for either to take the initiative, and that the act is not consummated until both have concurred. Who will controvert that?

Is this limitation upon the power of the people to come from the Democratic party, the party that has boasted through its history that it lay upon the breast of the people and was responsive to their impulses? Is it from Senators on that side of the Chamber that the argument is to come that the people may not originate a movement to set up a State government and bring it to Congress for ratification? It will be turning back the whole history of the party on this question if we divide here upon this bill on that proposition.

I called attention in my speech before to a brief extract from the letter of Mr. Webster to the governor of Texas, growing out of an attempt to set up in New Mexico a State government embracing territory that was claimed by the State of Texas. It is a most interesting letter. I read again a single extract from it, and I ask any constitutional lawyer in this body whether Mr. Webster is not absolutely and unquestionably right in what he says.

Mr. GEORGE. Would it suit the Senator to have all of it read?

Mr. HARRISON. I read but a single extract; I had a larger part of it read in my opening remarks. Mr. Webster said:

> But as it is the right of all to petition Congress for any law which it may constitutionally pass, this people were in the exercise of a common right when they formed their constitution with a view of applying to Congress for admission as a State.

Mr. BUTLER. Referring to what instrument?

Mr. HARRISON. Referring to the people in the Territory of New Mexico, an unorganized Territory of the United States, a Territory over which we had not even extended civil government of any kind. Where is the Senator who will deny that proposition, that "it is the right of all to petition Congress for any law which it may constitutionally pass," and "this people were in the exercise of a common right when they formed their constitution with a view of applying to Congress for admission as a State?" The man who wrote those words has been called the Expounder of the Constitution. He is a man whose fame as a constitutional lawyer is wider than the country that he honored with his great services. And shall I expect to find here on that side of the Chamber among Democrats who claim to stand as defenders of the ultimate rights of the people men who will controvert what Mr. Webster said, and deny to the people of Dakota the right to assemble and form a constitution and submit it to Congress for its ratification?

That, sir, is my proposition. It had been announced in the report of the committee before my attention was called to this discussion between Mr. Webster and the governor of Texas. I believe we assail the dearest, the deepest, the most fundamental rights of the people when we deny them the right thus to assemble and to respectfully petition Congress for anything that Congress may lawfully do. I can not go again to these memorials. The people of Dakota have expressly staid their State government for the action of Congress. They respectfully petition you to ratify what they have done and constitute them a State.

I said that the Senator from Missouri went out into the newspapers and to the field of the pamphleteer to find an adversary. In his first speech he made a personal reference to Judge Campbell, of Dakota, which I find repeated in a letter that he had read when he next addressed the Senate. I deem it fair to Judge Campbell, as reference has been made to what the Senator called his disreputable or unsavory connection with affairs in Louisiana, that what he has said in his own defense in a public letter to the Senator from Missouri should be heard in the Senate. I ask the Secretary to read down to the point that I have indicated with a pencil. That part of the letter which is somewhat personal I omit to have read, though I would have had it read if the Senator from Missouri had been in his seat.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Vest Answered—Judge Campbell's reply to the charges made against him by the Missouri Senator—his connection with the Presidential election in 1876 clearly stated—The recent action of the people of South Dakota very ably defended.
> CHICAGO, December 24.
> HON. GEORGE VEST, > United States Senator.
> SIR: I have this day, for the first time, been able to obtain an authentic copy of some remarks made by you in the Senate Chamber personal to myself. In the course of these remarks you took occasion to indorse, with the weight of your official position as Senator, certain charges against me in the following paragraph which I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for December 13, page 207:
> "A gentleman who, in recent events in the State of Louisiana, distinguished himself as a partisan of the Hayes administration, and who was rewarded by appointment as United States attorney for the Territory of Dakota for his zealous and not overscrupulous efforts in behalf of Mr. Hayes. This gentleman, carrying his revolutionary principles to the Territory of Dakota, now figures as the chairman of this committee."
> This short extract contains two serious misstatements with regard to myself, which, if I did not correct now in some proper manner, would perhaps be considered to be admitted by me to be true.
> You have, of course, a great advantage over me in your exalted official station, which enables you, as in this case, to scatter broadcast over the land such charges as you deem proper to make against individuals, while the correction I may make will reach a much more limited number of people. I submit to you, however, that this power brings with it, or ought to bring with it, a greater responsibility and a greater care that the power be not abused.
> As to my character, both as judge in Louisiana and as United States attorney in Dakota, for honesty and uprightness I can safely refer you to the people in both States who have known me best in both capacities, whether they be Democrats or Republicans. I was a Republican, and lived in the State of Louisiana during the Presidential election of 1876. I was not officially connected with that election nor with its management, directly or indirectly.
> My only direct participation in the election was to canvass a portion of the State before the election, and after the election to write a brief history of the election law of that State at the request of parties who desired me to do so. My only official act in connection with the election was this: As judge of the fourth district court, a number of witnesses whose testimony was taken before the returning board were sworn before me; and I also draughted a form of an affidavit in conformity with the law at the request of the Republicans. In none of these particulars did I do a single act which could be amenable to your charge of unscrupulousness; nor was I in any manner, directly or indirectly, a party to or concerned in any act which was not strictly honest and just in every sense. The only charge that was ever made against me for any connection with that election was a statement made before a Congressional committee by one James Anderson, under oath, in which he stated that the affidavit to which his name was appended, together with my jurat as having sworn him, had never been sworn to by him.
> I was subpœnaed as a witness before that committee, and testified then, as I say now, that if my signature to the jurat is genuine, and the paper itself genuine throughout—that is, not altered or forged in any way—then I would say positively that I did administer the oath to Mr. Anderson, for the reason that I have never, as judge, affixed my name to any jurat unless the oath had been previously administered by me to the person named therein.
> I stated further then, as I state now, that the number of witnesses sworn before me being quite large (several hundred in number), it was utterly impossible for me to remember personally, or in any way, except by reference to the paper itself, whether I had administered any one of the oaths to the individuals named in the jurats. Another witness, however, did testify before that committee that he did personally remember seeing Anderson take the oath before me.

I did not receive my appointment from Mr. Hayes as a reward for any effort of mine in behalf of Mr. Hayes. I have always understood that it was my brief on the law of elections in Louisiana which introduced me to the notice of Mr. Hayes. That brief was undoubtedly good law. It demonstrated the lawful election of the Packard government, which you will doubtless recollect was overthrown by a "revolution" of which I was an opponent, and of which your party were the advocates.

Mr. HARRISON. So much of this I have introduced simply because I deem it due to Judge Campbell, who has been twice drawn into this discussion, and about whom unfavorable comments have been made. But Judge Campbell's view of the law of this case as to whether Dakota is or is not a State I do not think is of controlling importance here.

The Senator from South Carolina spoke of this executive committee which had sent the constitution here as an executive committee of a political party, and he really seemed to be under the impression, until I corrected him, that it was the executive committee of some State political convention that was here communicating with Congress. One of the signers of this memorial, one of the members of this State executive committee, is Mr. J. A. Ward, a prominent Democrat of the Territory of Dakota and a member of this Territorial committee. Yet it is called a communication from the executive committee of a political party. But I have done with this question of phrases. If I chose to take the time I could show that in all other cases where constitutions have been sent here they have been designated to be State constitutions. In the nature of things it is impossible to designate them otherwise. I could show that distinguished Senators who have presented these constitutions and Presidents who have transmitted them to Congress when they have been formed without any enabling acts have called them State constitutions, and could not in the nature of things call them anything else. I have here in my hand the credentials of Hon. Thomas H. Benton to be a Senator from Missouri, issued I think about a year before Missouri was finally admitted into the Union. How do they read? The credentials are as follows:

STATE OF MISSOURI, to wit:

The General Assembly of this State on the second day of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, having in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States of America chosen Thomas H. Benton a Senator, I, Alexander McNair, being governor of the State of Missouri, do hereby certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

Given under my hand and private seal (there being no seal of State yet provided) this 9th day of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty.

A. McNAIR.

By the governor.

[SEAL.] JOSHUA BARTON,
Secretary of State.

I respectfully submit to Senators that this is not a question of phrases; that in dealing with the rights of this people in Dakota we are not to stand upon court etiquette; we are not to exclude them if they have, as is now confessed in this debate, all the requisites of Statehood simply because the phrases with which they come to us do not accord with our sense of what is nice and proper.

In the course of the debate before, and in the report of the committee, I alluded to the ordinance of 1787 as containing certain guarantees which had been extended by law to the people of Dakota. The Senator from South Carolina gravely advised me that the ordinance of 1787 had been suspended by the adoption of the Constitution. In the first session of the very first Congress the ordinance of 1787 was revived. The case to which he refers in 10 Howard as holding that the ordinance of 1787 had been superseded was a case of this sort: A slave from Kentucky had been permitted by his master to go into Ohio, and having returned to the State of Kentucky a claim was made in his behalf that he had become free, having been allowed to pass into Ohio under the provisions of the ordinance of 1787. The court, Judge Taney delivering the opinion, simply held that as to Ohio, Congress having accepted the constitution of Ohio, which prohibited slavery, no Federal question arose under the ordinance of 1787 that could be taken into the United States courts; that that Constitution had as to that matter superseded the ordinance. But does the Senator from South Carolina argue as a lawyer that when in 1836 Congress said the privileges and benefits of the ordinance of 1787 shall be extended to the people of Dakota this would not be efficient legislation, even if it were true that the ordinance was dead at the time the act was passed, and was simply referred to in order that the intention of Congress as to these privileges and immunities might be understood?

Mr. BUTLER. No, all that I would state as a lawyer—and I confess I am not as good a one as the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is modest.

Mr. BUTLER. All I attempted to state in that connection and all I did state was that where the ordinance of 1787 came in conflict with any provision of the Constitution, which was the fundamental law adopted two years afterwards, the ordinance gave way. I did not say that the ordinance of 1787 had been entirely superseded by the Constitution.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the remarks of the Senator did not meet either my argument or the suggestions of the report, because my argument was that the compact was extended to Dakota by the act of 1836. What was the use of trying to establish from the case in 10 Howard or what was the use in saying that the ordinance of 1787 had been superseded by the Constitution when it was revived at the first session of the First Congress, and when in 1836 Congress declared that its privileges and immunities should extend to the Territory of Dakota?

Mr. BUTLER. Simply for the reason that the argument I made, and I only made it for what it was worth, was that the Constitution of 1789, having prescribed another mode for the admission of States, the provisions of the ordinance of 1787 were as to that superseded. That was the argument I used.

Mr. HARRISON. If the ordinance of 1787 gave to the people of any Territory to which it referred the right to become a State when it should have 60,000 population, then, when Congress in 1836 extended those privileges to Dakota, what is there in the Constitution that takes away the right? Nothing, certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I read the article from the Constitution upon which I relied. The Senator can put his own construction upon it, of course.

Mr. HARRISON. I have never claimed that the ordinance of 1787, as extended to Dakota or any other State, took away from Congress a certain discretion with reference to the admission of States, for it is not simply a question of 60,000 people, but it is also a question of the area in which 60,000 people shall be found. So I have argued that the question of the area of a State, of its capacity to sustain a population, the character and disposition of its people, were matters of which Congress must judge in any case.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator, as a matter of course, sustains all that I undertook to claim for what I stated in my observations the other day—everything that I claimed for it. He comes now, I am glad to see, and meets an argument and stops talking about side issues.

Mr. HARRISON. I am willing to submit to a reasonable amount of proper interruption, but hardly to that sort of criticism. I have not been talking about side issues. If the Senator has any trouble I think it has been because I have been talking about central issues in this case.

There are two or three matters to which I wish to call attention. The Senator from South Carolina said that in the case of Tennessee an enabling act was not necessary, because, as to Tennessee, the State of North Carolina had consented, and that the consent of the State was equivalent to an enabling act. The Territory of Tennessee was ceded by North Carolina to the United States. I have at my desk the deed of cession, and there was no condition in it as to this matter except that it was to be constituted into a State or States; that was all. It came to us just as the Northwest Territory came to us. No act of North Carolina could give to the people of Tennessee any right to organize a State government or have a whit more effect in relation to the question of the admission of Tennessee than it had to the admission of the State of Indiana. Tennessee was a part of our public domain. We had received it simply upon the condition that we received the cession from Virginia, and upon the same condition that we received the cession from Louisiana, that we would constitute the people who should settle there into States—a condition that applies quite as well to Dakota as to any of the States that have previously been constituted.

Enough then for this part of the case. Here are a people asking for admission against whose fitness no Senator has ventured in this debate to allege a word. They are here pursuing methods that have been recognized in nearly one-half of the cases of the admission of States since the original thirteen—at least nearly one-half of those that passed through a Territorial organization to Statehood. They are here, not asserting themselves to be a State, not resisting the authority of the government, but respectfully, and yet in a manly way, asking those rights guaranteed by treaty and ordinance, guaranteed by tradition and precedent, guaranteed by the very organization of the Government under which we live, a Government of the people, a Government that treats it as an anomaly that anywhere under her flag there should be a people who do not choose their own rulers and regulate their own local and domestic affairs. Yet I am to expect here that Senators on the other side of the Chamber who so strenuously in debate and even in open war asserted this right of local control are to resist the appeal of nearly 300,000 American citizens, who ask here to share with you the immunities and privileges of American citizenship. I do not know what the party stress may be; I have not been disposed to discuss that question; but if I were at all to take the part of advisor to my Democratic friends, I should ask them to consider for a moment whether they can thus safely turn back upon the traditions of their own party, whether a momentary advantage may not be more than lost in thus antagonizing the just rights of this people, for it can not be made a local wrong. Wrong is never local; it is universal. The relationships of the people who dwell there stretch out into every neighborhood in all the States. Every manly man who values his own rights as a citizen will be regardful of the rights of others.

I come now to consider the question of division. What consideration should control? I have already said that for one I believe it is a question that Congress could not always submit to the determination of the people of a Territory; that it affects the general good; that we as Senators must look into the question somewhat for ourselves and say what is right. Yet, I agree that the opinions and wishes of the people who live there are entitled to great weight and to our most respectful consideration.

What has been our public policy on this subject? The Senator from Missouri, arguing for the admission of the Territory as a single State, said there would be two larger States. We are asked to make Dakota the third State in size in the American Union.

Congress has never prescribed to any State including as large an area as the whole Territory of Dakota. California and Texas only are larger. In the case of Texas it was expressly stipulated in the act admitting her into the Union that that State might be divided into five States. Here is an expression of the opinion of Congress as to what is the suitable size for an American State? California is the only other larger State, and California prescribed her boundaries for herself.

So I assert that Congress has never suggested in the case of any State an area of 150,000 square miles, which would be the area of Dakota if admitted. Divide the State of Texas into five States and each would have 53,000 square miles, 24,000 less than the State of Dakota, as bounded in the bill of the committee. The average size of the new States which have been admitted to the Union since the original thirteen is 66,435 square miles, including Texas and counting it as a single State. So the State I propose here is 11,000 square miles larger than the average of the States which have been admitted since the original thirteen, and would be much more in excess of the average if the original thirteen were included.

Why this discrimination? Will Senators from the Southwest and West tell me upon what ground they justify themselves? I have heard in the not distant past the suggestion coming from gentlemen from the Southwest and South that New England had too large a control in the Senate of the United States, that the smaller States of the original confederation had an overweening and controlling power here in the higher branch of Congress. Yet these gentlemen now insist that it shall be the policy of the West and Southwest to demand that Dakota shall have 150,000 square miles and only two representatives in the Senate of the United States.

Is it not possible, Senators, that divisions may sometimes be drawn on other lines? Is it not possible that this discrimination against the great agricultural populations of the West may yet come home to plague you? Is it not possible that this disposition to magnify and conserve and increase the representation of the smaller States here may yet be in your way in the consideration of some of the great questions of finance and revenue? Is it to be true by your votes that these great agricultural regions of the West shall be diminished in their representation in the Senate? If so, let us have the record made.

But it is said the people do not want it, and the Senator from Missouri at this point introduces his procession of stage soldiers and marches them around. I shall not follow that Senator far in this line. He read a letter of Mr. Dickie relating to the Fargo convention. I shall not stop to read it now, but I have here the evidence from reputable newspapers in North Dakota that the Fargo convention was called for the purpose of declaring against division on the forty-sixth parallel; that it was the friends of anti-division who got up the convention, and that those who favored division gave little attention to it. Yet when the convention met they had to lay the subject aside, for they could not carry resolutions against division. A resolution was adopted to the effect that the convention would give no expression on the subject at all. Here is a convention assembled in North Dakota that you say is to be rudely severed from her relations to South Dakota without her consent, a convention called to give expression to the anti-division sentiment, and yet when the convention was assembled they were not able to get a resolution through against division on the forty-sixth parallel.

I shall not refer at any length to the Whitbeck letter. I am extremely reluctant in the Senate, where the persons whose names and characters we are called upon to discuss are not present, to say anything about the personal character of men. I will say as to this Mr. Whitbeck, whose letter the Senator from Missouri had read in the Senate, that if Senators want to know who he is and what he is and the origin of these malicious flings against Judge Moody, ask that gentleman about Mr. Whitbeck and ask others who know him. So far from being the editor of a paper, he is a mere local reporter or news-gatherer, now on one paper and now on another. I am sure when you push your inquiries as far as you may be disposed and have an opportunity to do among Dakotaians who are here, you will not give much weight or influence to the opinion of Mr. Whitbeck, but that you will on the other hand conclude that his expressions were not fit to be laid before Senators as indicative of the sentiment in Dakota.

Mr. GEORGE. Is not Mr. Whitbeck a correspondent of the Chicago Times?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; Mr. Whitbeck is a gentleman who lives at Deadwood, who wrote a letter which was read by the Senator from Missouri in the course of his remarks.

There are some other gentlemen. Whenever we ask a Senator on the other side for the source of his information, it is either Mr. Boynton or Mr. Johnson. The Senator from Missouri read a letter addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Territories. I wish to call attention to a few of the expressions in that letter, and also to the address to the Democratic voters of the Territory. Mr. Boynton was a member of the constitutional convention that assembled in 1883 in South Dakota and framed a constitution for South Dakota.

Mr. GEORGE. Was that convention held in pursuance of a Territorial law?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; it was held without any Territorial law. The Legislature passed the bill, but the governor, Governor Ordway, declined to sign it, and it failed to become a law. A popular convention was held, and this Mr. Boynton, who claims now to represent the anti-division sentiment, and who indulges in this letter in criticism of those who have framed the present constitution, was himself a member of the constitutional convention of 1883; and I am advised by those who were there that he insisted upon going forward and electing State officers and completing a State organization.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator from whom he derives that information?

Mr. HARRISON. I derive that information from Judge Moody, who was in the convention.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely wish to get the facts as we go along.

Mr. HARRISON. I have in the room of the Committee on Territories that constitution of 1883 as it was submitted with Abraham Boynton's name to it as a member of the Convention. The Senator from Missouri says men change their views. Yes, Mr. President, they may and do change; but when, without any act of the Legislature, Mr. Boynton went into that movement for a constitution and was one of the most zealous promoters of it, I submit it does not lie in his mouth now to criticise those who in a more orderly way, and supported by more than twice the popular vote that his movement had, have laid a constitution before Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. Am I to understand that the Senator would have us infer from that statement that Mr. Boynton is unworthy of credit, or is the Senator merely discussing what he has done as a matter of taste?

Mr. HARRISON. I say that the man who participated in such a convention so late as 1883 is not the man to criticise those who in 1885 did only what he did.

Mr. BUTLER. But the Senator does not answer my inquiry very distinctly. If he does not choose to do so, of course I do not press it.

Mr. HARRISON. I have answered the inquiry. I propose to show the purpose of Mr. Boynton, if the Senator will be patient for a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to know.

Mr. HARRISON. In the course of this letter he says:

> In support of this protest I inclose a copy of the unanimous protest and address of the regular Democratic Territorial committee, which was promulgated and published throughout the Territory previous to the election at which the so-called officials of the State government in the southern part of the Territory claim to have been elected.

Now, I wish to show that the Democratic convention of the Territory, from which Mr. Boynton derived his authority to act as a committeeman, passed a resolution in favor of division, and then I wish to ask the Democrats on that side of the Chamber who are familiar with their party organization and its methods whether when a convention has declared in its platform in favor of a particular measure an individual member of the committee or the whole committee are authorized to rescind it as an expression of democratic sentiment. I have here in the Daily Sioux Falls Press the proceedings of that convention. I ask the Secretary to read the opening paragraph, which is the address of the president of the convention, and if the Senator from Missouri were here he would recognize it, I think, from the remarks of the president as being genuine as the sentiment of his party, and then in another column I ask the Secretary to read the resolution on the subject of division.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date of that paper, if I may inquire of the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. It was the last Democratic convention held in Dakota, and the date of the paper is October 2, 1884. I ask the Secretary to read what is marked, the opening address of the president of the convention, and then the resolution on the subject of division.

The Secretary read as follows:

NOMINATING A CANDIDATE—TEMPORARY ORGANIZATION.

The Democratic Territorial convention met in the court-house at 2 p. m., and was called to order by D. M. Inman, chairman of the central committee, who presented the name of C. H. Price, of Hyde County, as temporary chairman, and he was unanimously elected.

In taking the chair Mr. Price made a facetious speech, declaring the watchword of the Democracy to be, "Cleveland and reform! Hendricks and revenge!" He referred to the old story that all that hell lacks is decent society and good water, and said that this convention is as good society as he wants, and that while water is good enough as a beverage for cows, jackasses, and Republicans, the Democracy prefers whisky straight, without sugar or adulterating trimmings. He read Rise-up William Allen's definition of the Democratic party, and then declared he would rather be a high private in the rear ranks of such an organization than a general at the head of the column led by the doomed knight, for he wanted to be identified with the movement for restoring this Government to its pristine purity, and he felt that the only way for the Democracy to capture the honors and the emoluments of office is for them to hang together. The applause at the first stages of the speech was quite hearty, but it dwindled as the speaker blurted out opinions which were felt to be well enough as private expressions, but which made the cold chills run through the delegates when publicly stated as the sentiments of the party.

Mr. HARRISON. Now read the resolution marked in another column.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That we are in favor of the division of the Territory on the seventh standard parallel, and appeal to the Democratic members of Congress to favor such division.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the latest expression of a Democratic convention in Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. But the line of that——.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will just be patient for one minute——

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I had not the slightest idea of disturbing his equanimity.

Mr. HARRISON. He says "the seventh standard parallel," which would be at some parts of the Territory a difference of two or three miles. The seventh standard parallel is not surveyed entirely across the Territory; but here is the declaration of the last Democratic convention held in the Territory for a division on an east and west line that is practically the same with the forty-sixth parallel.

Who are these gentlemen who come here? A committee appointed by that convention, and they come here and oppose division, or they come here and suggest division on a north and south line to the Senator from Missouri. I do not know, gentlemen, what party discipline is on your side, but it seems to me clear that a committee constituted by a convention has no right to rescind its platform.

Further, as to this address which has been spoken of, and which purports to be issued by the Democratic committee of the Territory, it has already been read. I have had placed in my hands a dispatch from James A. Ward, who is a member of that committee, a man of the highest respectability, and widely connected with the business interests of Dakota. To show how this proposition was gotten up let me read from the address:

At a meeting of the Democratic Territorial committee held this day at Mitchell to consider the proper course to be taken, &c., it was decided by said committee, after consultation with numerous prominent Democrats from all sections of the Territory then and there present, that the proper policy of the Democratic party is to take no action whatever, &c.

The resolution says:

The entire proceedings from their inception in the Legislature down to the present time are revolutionary and antagonistic to the best interest of the people of Dakota.

We deny the right of one part of the Territory to separate itself from the other without the express consent of the people of the whole.

Mr. Ward, referring to that meeting, gives us the following information:

PIERRE, DAK., January 31.

Hon. P. F. McCLURE—

It is addressed to another Democrat who is mayor of the city of Pierre and happens to be in this city—

Mitchell convention, October 14, of prominent Democrats and Territorial committee, called together by Chairman Inman. Resolutions against division on forty-sixth parallel and admission were tabled.

Mr. BUTLER. Whom does the Senator say that is from?

Mr. HARRISON. It is from Mr. James A. Ward, a member of the Democratic Territorial committee of Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. Is he a gentleman of character?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; he is a gentleman of character.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator, then, to say that Mr. Boynton and Mr. Johnson are not men of character?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not going to be questioned as to what I think of Mr. Boynton and Mr. Johnson further than I choose to express it. I am going to show here that the representation that a large assemblage of Democrats, with their committee, adopted certain resolutions is not true upon the statement of Mr. Ward and others.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, my only reason for interrupting the Senator was that he stated some time ago that he desired to see combatants in the same arena, and, inasmuch as he has been pummeling Mr. Boynton and Mr. Johnson pretty severely, I thought I would come to the rescue and at least ascertain if he thought they were respectable.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not turn this discussion into this form. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from South Carolina did it. They attempted to make the impression that here was a unanimous expression from the Democratic committee of the Territory and from a large assemblage of Democrats who had been brought into consultation against this bill and against this movement. I have shown you that the convention that constituted this committee declared for division on an east and west line, and I was now reading the dispatch of Mr. Ward as to what was done in that meeting where this action purports to have taken place. He says:

PIERRE, DAK., January 31, 1886.

Hon. P. F. McCLURE,
(Care of National Hotel, Washington, D. C.):

Mitchell convention, October 14, of prominent Democrats and Territorial committee, called together by Chairman Inman. Resolutions against division on forty-sixth parallel and admission were tabled; afterward adopted by majority of committee present in secret session—fourteen members and three proxies present. Membership, thirty.

JAMES A. WARD.

As it seems that this meeting which was called for consultation tabled the proposition against division on the forty-sixth parallel, voted it down, and after withdrawing from this consultation the committee present, being less than a majority of the whole committee, adopted these resolutions that have been presented here to the Senate.

Mr. President, if it were worth while to detain the Senate, I have here extracts from Democratic papers in the Territory showing the sentiment on the subject of division. I will not stop to read them, but from the Sioux Falls Argus, a Democratic paper, I take this list of Democratic papers in the Territory of Dakota that favor division on the forty-sixth parallel:

Salem News, Pierre Signal, Mitchell Mail, Arlington Sun, Miller Gazette, Milbank Review, Fargo Democrat, Scotland Citizen, Harrold Sentinel, Bismarck Journal, Manchester Times, Bridgwater Journal, Northwood Headlight, Highmore Vox Populi, Gettysburg Union-Index, Beadle County Democrat.

This, from a Democratic newspaper, is a partial list of the Democratic papers in the Territory of Dakota that support division on the forty-sixth parallel. If it were worth while to detain the Senate I have several pages of extracts from leading Democratic papers in Dakota, north and south, showing what the sentiment of the party there is upon this subject.

Mr. BUTLER. Put them in the RECORD. Let us have the record made up.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not care to encumber the RECORD with so much of this newspaper material. The Senator is welcome to see them.

Mr. BUTLER. I would rather have the record made up fully.

Mr. HARRISON. He will have the record made up of all I use and all I say, but nothing more.

Mr. President, the proposition to divide on the forty-sixth parallel has been under debate in Congress for four years, and I challenge the gentlemen who oppose division on that parallel to present the proceedings of a single popular convention, political or otherwise, held in North Dakota or in South Dakota that has ever passed resolutions against division by an east and west line. Four years it has been debated here, this exciting and interesting question, this attempt to cut that Territory in two and violate the wishes of its people, as Senators say; four years it has been under discussion here, and I challenge the gentlemen to produce a resolution adopted in any popular convention of any kind or in any Legislative Assembly against division by an east and west line. There has not been one. The sentiment has been so concurrent in both sections of that Territory that no one opposing division has ever been able to carry through any convention or any Legislature a resolution against it; and yet gentlemen tell us here they are not satisfied that it is the wish of the people to divide the Territory.

Mr. President, the next suggestion made is that the vote on the constitution is such that it did not show sufficient interest in the people, and that it has not received such a popular indorsement as should authorize us to accept it as the constitution of the State of Dakota. I have had made up a statement of the cases of Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Dakota, and California, in order that we might see what the vote had been upon the adoption of their constitutions by these different States at the time of their organization.

In Iowa the total population was 78,819. The vote was 18,528, making 1 voter to 4½ inhabitants.

In Kansas the vote was 15,951; the population was 107,206, or 1 in 7 of the population.

In Maine the vote was 9,836; the population 298,369, or 1 in 33 of the population.

In Nebraska the vote was 7,776; the population was 100,000, or 1 in 13 of the population.

In Wisconsin the vote was 22,591; the population was 180,000, or 1 in 8.

In Dakota the vote was 31,791, the population 263,553, or 8½ to one.

So that it seems that the vote in Dakota was as large as in the case of most of the States to which I have referred at the time of the adoption of their constitutions proportionately to population.

But now, Mr. President, how do we find it in some of the States when we come to take this question of the per cent. of their total vote cast at important national elections? In South Carolina by the census of 1880 the voters then in that State, white and black, were 205,789. The total vote cast at the Presidential election in 1884, four years afterward, when there had been a four years' increase of voters, was 91,578, only 4,778 in excess of the number of white voters there were in the State four years before and only about 44 per cent. of the voting population four years before. If this per cent. of the voting population of the State of South Carolina is to be regarded as entitled to such respect that it shall be effective to choose not only Senators but Presidents, is it to be contended by those who thus affirm that a vote of over 58½ per cent. of her population in Dakota for a constitutional convention is not sufficiently expressive of the popular will?

It may be interesting to look at the votes of some of the other States in this contrast. Alabama in the same year voted 59 per cent. of her voting population; Louisiana voted 50.3 per cent. of her voting population; South Carolina, as I have said, 44.5 per cent. of her voting population; and yet here in the case of Dakota upon the question of the adoption of a constitution, at a special election where there was no organized opposition, the people cast 58 per cent. of their voting population; and that vote is said to be so small as not to entitle it to the respect of Congress!

Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate further. I have spoken longer now than I intended. Where do we leave the debate? Dakota is conceded to possess every requisite of Statehood. It is not pretended that the course her people have taken has not been justified by abundant precedent and defended by the ablest and wisest of our public men. It can not be denied by any one that her people have a right to come here and make this proposition to Congress. It is not denied that when thus constituted she will have an area greatly in excess of the majority of the States, ranking eighth in the entire list. It is not denied that upon that area she will be able to maintain her full share of the increasing population of this great country. It is not denied that her people are intelligent, thrifty, well disposed toward the institutions of our country, well disposed toward the institutions of learning and religion, and that they cherish among them no institution that is out of line with the Christian civilization of the age. It is not denied that her Legislature for more than ten years, by unanimous votes, have been asking division. It is not denied that her legislation for ten years has assumed division upon the forty-sixth parallel. It is not denied that her people, by 25,500 votes as against 6,000, have expressed their wish to be admitted into the Union under the constitution which they have formed.

Where does the debate rest? Where do Senators put their opposition? It is not for me to suggest. If there are open minds here to this plea in behalf of 263,000 of your fellow-citizens who have forfeited no political right by any act of theirs, as well entitled to be endowed with full citizenship as any Senator who hears me to-day, now occupying that anomalous position that taxes may be imposed upon them, governors sent to administer their affairs, and judges to sit in arbitrament upon their disputes, without any voice in the selection of the men who shall discharge these governmental functions—are they to be continued so? If so, does the necessity grow out of their condition or is it formed elsewhere?

Mr. President, this plea of Dakota is not only heard here, where the decision rests in part, but it is heard throughout the land. She may be turned away now in order to gratify the fancy of the Senator from Alabama or to gratify some less commendable desire than that there shall be a fine arithmetical development in 1889 in the progress of the States. But these questions, while they are lodged with us for the time being, are in the control of a larger and a wider and a more powerful tribunal.

Again I appeal to those who would themselves, as the descendants of the men of '76, feel restive under such limitations upon their personal and political rights to do this simple act of justice for the people of Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BUTLER. For what purpose?

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Chair puts that motion he asks leave to lay before the Senate sundry House bills.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I made no motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we had better go on a little while with this bill. It is only a little after 4, and I think we can possibly finish it. I do not know how long the Senator from South Carolina proposes to speak.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not occupy the Senate long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida insist on his motion?

Mr. CALL. I ask if it will be more agreeable to the Senator from South Carolina to defer his remarks until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the motion of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. That the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that will not be done; and in saying this I am not speaking at all as to my own convenience; but I know other matters are pressing here, and I have come under some obligations to occupy the time as fully as we could with this discussion and to conclude it if possible. I have occupied the time pretty well to-day, I agree.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has occupied two hours and twenty minutes of the time, and the Senator from Illinois occupied, I think, about an hour and a half yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. And yet, all put together, it has not been as long a time as has been occupied by those who have opposed the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not making any comparison.

Mr. HARRISON. It is suggested to me whether we may not get some arrangement about taking the vote to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. I doubt very much whether it would be entirely fair to ask that, after what the Senator has said himself this evening and after what the Senator from Illinois said yesterday, his remarks not being in the RECORD this morning ——

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator that I shall have mine in the RECORD to-morrow, if I can.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not make any comparison.

Mr. HARRISON. If not, I will put the manuscript in the Senator's hands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels bound under the rules to interrupt the proceedings to lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 3160) to amend section 533 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 4378) to detach Hood County, Texas, from the Waco branch of the northern judicial district of Texas and attach the same to the Graham branch of said district, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4834) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 4, 1886.

To the President of the Senate pro tempore:

GROVER CLEVELAND.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In connection with that communication I offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in addition to the usual number, there be printed of the letter of the President of the 4th instant, communicating to the Senate copies of the reports of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, together with said reports, 3,000 copies; 1,000 for the use of the Senate and 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

MIAMI INDIAN FUNDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 4, 1886.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1392) for the relief of Mrs. Kate Hatton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1393) to extend the limits of the port of Portland as a port of entry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1395) for the relief of George C. Codd, late postmaster at Detroit, Mich.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was—Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Mrs. Kate Hatton be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. COLQUITT, it was—

Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Thomas A. McLaughlin be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was—Ordered, That the papers in the case of Arvah Hopkins be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Dakota bill being before the Senate, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] moves——

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Florida to yield to me a moment.

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I intended to have read in the course of my remarks a letter which I had before me, and which I will ask leave to have read now and have incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. BUTLER. Put it in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. I prefer to have it read. It is a letter from Hon. Bartlett Tripp, present chief-justice of the Territory of Dakota, appointed and confirmed at the present session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

YANKTON, DAK., January 20, 1886.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I have your favor of the 14th instant. I regret that I am unable to be at Washington with you, but my terms of court are so arranged that it will be doubtful whether I can come this winter. I had a long talk with President Cleveland when I was at Washington last and I am sure we may expect fair treatment from him. I stand where I have always stood since Dakota had the requisite population to entitle her to become a State. I am for immediate admission. I have spent all the best years of my life in a Territory. I would like to become an American citizen before I die or get too old to appreciate a "republican form of government."

With best wishes, I am, yours truly,

BARTLETT TRIPP.

Hon. G. C. MOODY, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say that some question being raised as to whether that division referred to was the division proposed in the bill, I have here a telegram addressed to Mr. Mellette from Bartlett Tripp, in which he says:

I am for division on the forty-sixth parallel.

I will incorporate this in my remarks.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is due to Mr. Johnson that I should have a letter read from him addressed to Senator MORGAN and myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks consent to have a paper read. If there be no objection it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Senator MORGAN or BUTLER:

You will find by the memoranda I handed you that it was fifteen members of the constitutional convention were elected to the "State" Legislature. I did not intend to say that fifteen members of the Territorial Legislature were members of the constitutional convention.

Respectfully,

L. G. JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I did give notice that I would want to proceed with this bill to-day to a conclusion if I could; but I do not wish to insist if the Senator from South Carolina feels that he does not want to go on to-night with what he has to say. After I have occupied as much time as I have done I do not feel that it would be just for me to insist. I should like to ask for unanimous consent to dispose of the bill at some hour to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt that can be done.

Mr. HARRISON. Suppose we do that. What time would the Senator suggest?

Mr. BUTLER. I will allow the Senator from Indiana to make the suggestion.

Mr. HARRISON. Say half past 4.

Mr. BUTLER. That will do.

Mr. HARRISON. Very good.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I only speak for myself; I have no right to commit anybody else.

Mr. HARRISON. We were just asking unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. It is possible some other Senator may wish to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that at half past 4 to-morrow the vote shall be taken upon the pending bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or earlier.

Mr. HARRISON. Or earlier if it can be reached.

Mr. BECK. I do not expect to say a word on the bill. I am ready to vote now, or at 2 o'clock or at 4 o'clock to-morrow; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is a leading member of the Committee on Territories——

Mr. HARRISON. He is not on the committee now.

Mr. BECK. He has taken an active part in this debate and seems to know quite as much about the subject as anybody else. He has been unwell for two or three days and not able to hear the speeches on the other side. I object to any agreement in his absence, though I am willing to vote now, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. I am advised by the colleague of the Senator from Missouri that his sickness is such that he is not likely to be in the Senate for a week or more. We certainly can not postpone the consideration of the bill till his return. I want to accommodate the Senator from South Carolina if we can get some arrangement about it, but if we can not I shall vote "nay" upon the motion to go into executive session.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will do as he pleases on that subject. I have simply done what I have seen done here, I think, a hundred times since I have been a member of the Senate, when a Senator expressed a desire for an adjournment in order that he might have an opportunity to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. If we can not have unanimous consent to an arrangement, let us go on.

Mr. BECK. I rose in absolute good faith. The Senator from Missouri may not wish to occupy time at all; but if, after the speech of the Senator from Illinois, made yesterday, which is not yet published in the RECORD, and the speech of the Senator from Indiana, made to-day, it is going to be intimated that the bill is to be pressed to-night unless an arrangement be made, I simply say that I can not agree, in the absence of the Senator from Missouri, to consent to a vote at a given hour to-morrow. If the idea is to force such an arrangement, so that the Senator from Missouri shall not he heard and shall not be consulted, the Senator from Indiana may be mistaken. The Senator from Missouri may be able to be here in the morning.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kentucky refuses to give consent. I simply then give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the bill, to take up the consideration of it immediately after the morning business and to conclude it during the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll, the pending question not being debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Indiana agrees to let the bill go over, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion to go into executive session——

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the motion for the Senator from Wisconsin.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY IN CHICAGO.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to present a report at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be received.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 484) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey certain premises in the city of Chicago, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that in the morning hour to-morrow I shall endeavor to call up the bill just reported, and I will state very briefly then the importance of it and ask its consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read twice, referred as indicated below, and ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. 52) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A bill (S. 71) for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 289) for the relief of J. S. Henry and others—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 24) for the relief of Samuel B. Seat, administrator of Christian Kropp, deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza D. Clarke, of New Orleans—to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled an act (H. R. 5186) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances for the relief of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker, and demand the regular order.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request:

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Agriculture, composing the subcommittee on appropriations, respectfully ask leave of the House to sit during the sessions of the House during the remainder of this week.

W. H. HATCH.
WHARTON J. GREEN.
EDWIN B. WINANS.
WILLIAM T. PRICE.
MILO WHITE.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the leave requested in this case will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of standing and select committees for reports to go to the appropriate Calendars.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 72) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, as a substitute for H. R. 192, a bill (H. R. 5196) to detach certain counties from the United States judicial district of California and create the United States judicial district of Southern California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

By unanimous consent, H. R. 192 was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. I will now, under the rule, call committees for the consideration of bills for one hour. The hour begins at nine minutes before 1 o'clock.

TEXAS EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, called up from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3160) to amend section 533 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 533 of the Revised Statutes be amended as follows, namely: Add, after the words "the eastern district includes the residue of said State," the following:

"Said eastern district shall be, and is hereby, divided into two divisions, to be known as the eastern and western divisions of the eastern district of Arkansas. The eastern division shall consist of the following counties, to wit: Mississippi, Crittenden, Lee, Phillips, Desha, Chicot, Clay, Craighead, Poinsett, Greene, Cross, Saint Francis, and Monroe; and the western division the remaining counties in said district; but no additional marshal shall be appointed in said district.

"The court for the eastern division shall be held at Helena, and for the western division at Little Rock, as now provided for by law; and each of said courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all matters cognizable in said courts and arising in the counties comprising the division to the same extent, to all intents and purposes, as if said divisions were separate districts."

Mr. CULBERSON demanded the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOOD COUNTY, TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, also called up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4378) to detach Hood County, Texas, from the Waco branch of the northern judicial district of Texas and attach the same to the Graham branch of said district, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the county of Hood, in the State of Texas, be, and the same is hereby, detached from the Waco branch of the northern judicial district of Texas and attached to the Graham branch of said district, and that all process against persons residing in said Hood County shall hereafter be returnable to said court at Graham, Tex.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAKING DEPOSITIONS IN CASES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, also called up from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4834) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in addition to the mode of taking the depositions of witnesses in causes pending at law in the district and circuit courts of the United States, it shall be lawful to take the depositions or testimony of witnesses in the mode prescribed by the laws of the State in which the courts are held.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. HALL. I ask the gentleman whether the bill authorizes depositions to be taken in accordance with the laws of the particular State in which the Federal court is sitting or introduces the methods of each State into the Federal courts of all the States—the methods of Texas into the Federal courts of Iowa?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state that this bill simply provides a method of taking the depositions of witnesses for use in Federal courts in addition to the one already prescribed by statute. It does not attempt to repeal the law of Congress or to change it, but it merely gives an additional method. That is to say, whenever the United States court is sitting in any State any party in a suit pending in that court can take depositions either by the mode prescribed by the act of Congress or the mode prescribed by the laws of the State in which the court sits.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there not legislation of the States for that purpose?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Supreme Court has decided, and that is the reason why this legislation is made necessary—the courts having heretofore permitted depositions to be taken in the mode and manner prescribed by the law of the State where the court is sitting; but, as I have said, the Supreme Court has lately decided that Congress, having prescribed the method by which depositions are to be taken, the Federal court must follow that act and not tolerate the practice of taking them in the mode prescribed by the State laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not aware of that decision, and therefore asked the question I did.

Mr. GOFF. Why not let the provisions of the bill also extend to the suits in equity?

Mr. CULBERSON. I saw no objection to that being done, but the committee recommended no amendment in that regard.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has the gentleman from Texas carefully examined the provisions of the bill to see what the effect will be? It seems to me, from a cursory reading of the bill, that it does permit the taking of depositions in other States in accordance with the laws of the State where the court is sitting; as, for instance, to be taken in Iowa in accordance with the law of Texas.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what is intended.

Mr. REED, of Maine. We ought to know thoroughly the effect of the provisions of this bill before it is passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. In suits pending in Maine in the United States court, if you desire to take testimony of witnesses residing in Arkansas, you can do it, if this bill shall become the law, either in the mode prescribed by the act of Congress, or you can take the testimony in the mode prescribed by the law of Maine.

Mr. LANHAM. It is merely cumulative to the methods already prescribed in the Federal statutes and provides an additional mode for taking testimony, so that a party litigant can pursue either mode.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all.

The bill was passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAR TAXES AS SET-OFF AGAINST STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. HAMMOND, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States, as set-off against States having claims against the General Government.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other person charged with or concerned in the payment of any sum of money from the United States to any State of the Union, to withhold the same from such State, or its duly authorized agent, by reason of any claim that such State is bound for any part of the war tax levied by the act of August 5, 1861, or any act amendatory thereof, or to treat the said tax in any way as a set-off against any claim in favor of any State.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws, and all rulings or decisions of any Department of the Government or of any officer thereof, inconsistent with the foregoing section be, and are hereby, repealed and annulled.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Georgia will allow the report of the committee to be read.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Indiana suggests the report of the Committee on the Judiciary be read.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not desire it to be read in my time; but as this bill will occupy more than this hour, I would suggest, by unanimous consent, the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, be printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning, and then every gentleman can have them on his table before discussion is ended and before we are called upon to vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will be done.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I ask, by unanimous consent, that the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report of the Committee on the Judiciary as well as the views of the minority are as follows:

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 3:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred bill H. R. 3, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

By an act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, the Secretary of the Treasury was required to pay to the State of Georgia $35,555.42 (see 22 U. S. Stat., 485). It was not paid because of a decision of Mr. Lawrence, First Comptroller of the Treasury, placing it to the credit of the State on the books of the Treasury against a sum charged there against the State as its quota of a direct tax levied during the late war.

Bill H. R. 4703, first session Forty-eighth Congress, was to compel payment, that decision to the contrary notwithstanding. The Judiciary Committee, by Mr. Hammond, on the 11th of March, 1884, reported in favor of the passage of that bill. (See Report No. 752, first session Forty-eighth Congress.)

On the 2d of May, 1884, Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, introduced and had referred to said committee a bill (H. R. 6867) to authorize settlements with any State, and directing that "in such settlement and adjustment no charge shall be made, or if made shall be valid, by way of set-off or otherwise, against any State on account of the direct war tax laid by Congress by an act approved August 5, 1861."

On the 20th of May, 1884, said committee, by Mr. Hammond, reported thereon as follows:

"The obstacles in the way of paying claims of States against the General Government growing out of the charge of the direct war tax against the States on the books of the Treasury Department, and the opinions by Treasury officials thereon, as well as the reasons why those obstacles should be removed, are set forth in Report No. 752 of this session of Congress in the Georgia case, made on the —th of March, 1884.

"Your committee believe that the relief therein recommended for that State should be general as to all the States against which such set-off of war taxes is being or may be claimed, and report accordingly. They, however, report a substitute for bill H. R. 6867, and recommend the passage of the substitute herewith submitted."

The substitute so reported was this:

"That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other person charged with or concerned in the payment of any sum of money from the United States to any State of the Union, to withhold the same from such State, or its duly authorized agent, by reason of any claim that such State is bound for any part of the war tax levied by the act of August 5, 1861, or any act amendatory thereof, or to treat the said tax in any way as a set-off against any claim in favor of any State.

"SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws, and all rulings or decisions of any Department of the Government, or of any officer thereof, inconsistent with the foregoing section, be, and are hereby, repealed and annulled."

This report was No. 1658, and the substitute bill H. R. 7082, first session, Forty-eighth Congress. The substitute bill and Georgia's separate bill both remained on the Calendar, but were never reached in the last Congress. The present bill (H. R. 3) is a copy of said substitute.

This committee adopted the reasoning of the former Judiciary Committee in those reports.

While the former was on the Georgia case only, it covered all the States in like condition. Omitting, therefore, only the introductory parts already substantially given, your committee adopts the language of that report, as follows:

"A little history will cast much light upon the subject. The act of August 5, 1861, provided for collectors and assessors, and for lists of property 'from all persons owning, possessing, and having the care or management of any lands,' &c., for the purpose of taxing the same. (Sections 14 to 29, inclusive.)

"Section 33 enacted that 'the taxes so assessed shall be and remain a lien upon all lands and other real estate of the individuals who may be assessed for the same' for two years.

"Section 52 provided that as soon as Federal authority could be restored in the Southern States the tax should be collected 'from the persons residing or holding property or stocks therein.'

"The eighth section enacted—

"'That a direct tax of $20,000,000 be and is hereby annually laid upon the United States, and the same shall be and is hereby apportioned to the States, respectively, in manner following: * * * To the State of Georgia, $584,367.33½.'

"To the other States according to their populations, respectively. But so far from proposing to tax the States as such, by section 13 it expressly exempted from such taxes 'all property, of whatever kind * * * belonging to the United States or any State,' &c.

"Section 53 enacted 'that any State or Territory and the District of Columbia may lawfully assume, assess, collect, and pay into the Treasury of the United States the direct tax, or its quota thereof, imposed by this act upon the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in its own way and manner, by and through its own officers, assessors, and collectors,' with deduction of 15 per cent. if paid by the 30th of June, and of 10 per cent. if paid by the last of September, of the tax year.

"It further provided 'that whenever notice of the intention to make such payment by the State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall have been given to the Secretary of the Treasury,' then the United States should cease trying to collect by its officers unless such State should 'be in default.' In that event the Secretary of the Treasury 'was to collect all or any part of said direct tax the same as though said State, Territory, or District had not given notice nor assumed to levy, collect, and pay said taxes or any part thereof (section 46).

"Said section 53 further provided—

"'That the amount of direct tax apportioned to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall be liable to be paid and satisfied in whole or in part by the release of such State, Territory, or District, duly executed to the United States, of any liquidated and determined claim of such State, Territory, or District of equal amount against the United States, with the same abatement as if it were paid in money.' (See 12 U. S. Statutes, 292-312.)

"Another law of June 7, 1862, applied only to the States in 'insurrection or rebellion.' It made the tax upon each parcel of land in each State chargeable with the tax due upon that parcel, plus 50 per cent., and made a lien on the lands therefor. It provided that 'the owner or owners of said lots or parcels of lands' might discharge them by paying within a fixed time.

"It provided for commissions to collect the tax in those States, to sell the lands of defaulting owners, &c., but was silent as to any assumption of the tax by those States. (12 U. S. Statutes, 422-426.)

"From time to time Congress passed other acts as to direct taxes, but none of them seem to have any bearing upon this question. For instance, that of May 13, 1862, enlarged the release proviso to include certain expenditures of the States in sending troops to the war, &c. (Ib., 384); that of July 1, 1862, limited the collection to one year, till April, 1865 (Ib., 489), and that of February 6, 1863, provided for sales of lands and redemption by their 'owners' (Ib., 640).

"All the States, &c., 'formally assumed the payment of the tax except Delaware, the Territory of Colorado, and the eleven insurrectionary States.' (Report Commissioner Internal Revenue, 1870. Sen. Ex. Doc. 24, first session Forty-sixth Congress, 236.)

"The collection of them was suspended as to unpaid sums by Congress.

"In 1868 an account was opened upon the books of the Treasury Department against the State of Georgia for her said quota of the direct tax, though Georgia had in no way assumed to pay the same. We stop not now to discuss why that was done, but proceed with the history.

"The Western and Atlantic Railroad belongs to Georgia. The State bought for said road some of the rolling stock which had been used by the United States at the South in prosecuting the late war. This property was paid for in cash, the last payment being on the 16th of October, 1867. By an act approved the 3d of March, 1877, because of alleged overvaluation of said property when sold, Congress authorized the reopening of said account and adjustment thereof. The act required:

"'That when said claims shall have been adjusted in pursuance of the provisions of this act the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue his warrant on the Treasury of the United States to the governor of Georgia or his order, for the amount of money it is found ought to be refunded to said railroad on account of said settlement.' (19 U. S. Stat., 402-3.)

"The amount found to be due the State on that account was $199,038.58. (See Q. M. Gen.'s Report, 1887, p. 120.)

"So far as we are advised no question of set-off was then made. Certainly the money was paid in cash.

"On the 3d of March, 1879, Congress enacted in the sundry civil bill—

"'That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the State of Georgia $72,296.94 for advances made to the United States for the suppression of hostilities by the Creek, Seminole, and Cherokee Indians in 1835, 1836, 1837, and 1838, and that said sum be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.'

"When payment was requested the Third Auditor called attention to this direct-tax account, and asked information. Mr. Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, referred to Hon. A. G. Porter, First Comptroller, 'whether said amount should be set off against the amount of the direct tax under act August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereto, apportioned to the State.' He wrote an opinion. In stating the facts, after giving a synopsis of the acts of 1861 and of June, 1862, ante, he added: 'The State of Georgia never assumed the amount apportioned to that State, or any part of it.' And then, after stating the question, he said:

"'If the sum apportioned is a debt owing by the State of Georgia, as a political corporation, then it may be assumed that it ought to be so credited. If, however, it is a debt owing by the persons within that State, whose lands have been taxed, and not by the State itself, then payment ought not to be withheld.'

"He then called attention to the decision of Mr. McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury in 1866, as to Texas, and said:

"'Mr. McCulloch treated the apportionment of the direct tax as a debt owing by citizens of Texas belonging to the class whose property was taxed, and not as a debt owing by the State in its political capacity.'

"Proceeding, he said:

"'The privilege of a State to assume implies that the debt before the assumption was not its own. Before the adoption of the Constitution the person whose property was charged with the tax owed the tax to the State, because the State imposed it and levied and collected it. Since the adoption of that instrument the United States has imposed the tax, and has itself levied and collected it. The obligation of the citizen is therefore to the Union and not to the State, and he and not the State is the debtor.'

"Enforcing his view by various citations, urging that any other would leave the States with power to thwart the collection of taxes, in an emergency, directly from the people, and declaring that this direct tax of 1861 could still be collected when the United States wishes, he concluded:

"'It follows, therefore, that it is my duty to direct that the sum appropriated to the State of Georgia shall not be credited as upon a debt owing by that State to the United States, but shall be paid at once to the State.'

"In answer to a resolution by the Senate this decision was transmitted, 'with accompanying papers,' to the Senate by Secretary Sherman on May 24, 1879. (See Senate Ex. Doc. No. 24, first session Forty-sixth Congress.)

"The 'accompanying papers' show that before this opinion was made attention was called to the fact that Kansas, Missouri, West Virginia, and other States had been credited with various sums there stated. Mr. Porter paid no attention to them, because (as we presume) they had assumed their respective quotas, and thus made them a debt against the States as such. Subsequently, in May, 1881, Mr. Lawrence, the successor of Mr. Porter, decided the Kansas case. His opinion contains thirty-three head-notes and twenty-five subhead-notes. Those which are material, in our opinion, to the present discussion are as follows:

"'In May, 1879, it was decided by the then First Comptroller that the direct tax apportioned to the State of Georgia by the acts of August 5, 1861, and of June 7, 1862, was not a debt of the corporate State, which had not by an act assumed it; and that although the tax had not been paid, yet money due from the United States to the State must be paid to the latter, and could not be used by way of set-off or in discharge of any part of the claim for direct taxes. (8. Ex. Doc. No. 24, first session Forty-sixth Congress.) That conclusion is correct in law. The decision of that question was affected somewhat by the act of June 7, 1862, not applicable to the question now presented. But the same result would be reached without reference to it. Under the Constitution Congress can not levy or enforce the collection of a tax or assessment on a corporate State which has not assumed it. The National Government does not operate on States in the collection of revenues, but on persons or property, or both.' (2 Lawrence, Compt., Dec., 310.)

"He further held that his predecessors had decided that Kansas had voluntarily assumed her quota of the tax; that he was bound by that decision, and that therefore a sum appropriated to Kansas should not be paid, but must be placed to her credit against said assumed debt. (Ib., 324.)

"The decision of Lawrence, Comptroller, made 12th of May, 1883, refusing to pay this money to Georgia, has thirty head-notes. We do not believe that we need differ with any of them but the sixth, seventh, tenth, and nineteenth. We call attention to them, and the eighth, also. They are:

"'6. The First Comptroller had jurisdiction and authority in May, 1868, to certify a balance as due from the State of Georgia to the United States for the quota of direct taxes apportioned to said State by the direct-tax act of August 5, 1861. (12 Stat., 294.)

"'7. The Comptroller now in office can not inquire whether the Comptroller in office in May, 1868, who then certified a balance due from the State of Georgia to the United States on account of direct taxes, had before him sufficient evidence to authorize such action, or whether on such evidence as he then had he properly construed the law. The judicial courts or Congress can furnish the only relief in such case, if the comptroller erred in charging the State with such liability.

"'8. Congress may by law require the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to set off a claim of the United States against a State, when such State demands payment of a claim due to it from the United States, although in such case Congress might not under the Constitution charge such corporate State with a liability and enforce its payment in any other mode except by such set-off.

"'9. The legislation of Congress in relation to the quota of direct taxes apportioned to Missouri and West Virginia seems in principle to recognize the correctness of the judgment of the First Comptroller, by which, in May, 1868, he certified a balance as due from the State of Georgia to the United States for its quota of the direct tax apportioned to that State by the act of August 5, 1861.

"'10. The direct-tax act of August 5, 1861 (12 Stat., 311, section 53), provides a special statutory mode of paying the quota of tax apportioned to any State by declaring that it 'shall be liable to be paid' by set-off 'of any liquidated and determined claim of such State * * * against the United States.

* * * * * * *

"'19. The balance certified by the First Comptroller, May 29, 1868, as due to the United States from the State of Georgia, for its quota of direct tax, under the act of August 5, 1861, has not been in any form set aside or rendered inoperative.'

"First Did any Comptroller ever, in any fair sense, try to raise a debt against Georgia for this tax? Mr. Lawrence, in this opinion, stated the facts in this language:

"'May 11, 1868, by report No. 55448 the Fifth Auditor "examined and adjusted an account between the United States and the State of Georgia," and found "that the sum of $584,367.33 is due from said State to the United States * * * for amount of direct tax imposed and apportioned by the eighth section of" the direct-tax act of August 5, 1861, "amount to be debited to the State of Georgia on the books of the Register of the Treasury."

"'May 29, 1868, the First Comptroller certified to the Register a balance due and payable as stated in the above report, and it was accordingly charged, on the Register's books, as a debt due from the State of Georgia to the United States.

"'September 3, 1874, the Fifth Auditor by report No. 5 adjusted an account between the United States and T. P. Robb, Samuel A. Pancoast, and John C. Bates, commissioners of direct tax for the State of Georgia, from August 1, 1865, to December 15, 1866, and found them chargeable with "amount of direct tax laid upon the State of Georgia by act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, $584,367.33." The report shows costs chargeable to the State $649.72, and finds the commissioners entitled to credit for salaries and expenses $9,835.06, amount of taxes remaining uncollected $301,939.86, amount refunded to tax-payers on account of collections improperly made $46.17, and cash deposited $71,407.75, covered into the Treasury by miscellaneous warrants numbered and dated in 1866, respectively, 747 March 31, 524 June 25, 607 June 30, 596, September 20, and 726 December 31.

"'January 9, 1875, the acting First Comptroller certified a balance of $1,788.22 "due to the United States from the commissioners, as stated in the above report." The amount of these warrants was placed to the credit of the State of Georgia in the Register's office on said account for direct taxes.'

"In May, 1868, the amount fixed by the statue as the quota of Georgia was charged to her, and afterward, in 1874, the same amount was charged by the same office to the United States commissioners of direct tax for the State of Georgia, and they were credited with various sums collected and uncollected, and among others an "amount refunded to tax-payers on account of collections improperly made, $46.17." The dealing with "tax-payers" showed that the State was not considered the debtor. The "tax-payers" owed only if Georgia had not assumed the debt. Taking the two accounts together, it seems plain that the account was so stated only for convenience of keeping the books of the Department. Any other view makes us to assume that the officer raising the account acted in ignorance of the law. The First Comptroller could have no jurisdiction under the act of 1861 to state an account against any State which had not assumed the debt.

"It is true, as stated in the tenth head-note, supra, that said act provides a special statutory mode of paying the quota of tax apportioned to any State, by declaring that it 'shall be liable to be paid' by set-off 'of any liquidated and determined claim of such State * * * against the United States.' But more is true. That 'special satutory mode of paying' is in the words which Mr. Lawrence omitted from the quotation, namely, 'by the release of such State * * * duly executed to the United States.' By such release, with a view to such credit, the State consents to the account against it, and thus assumes the debt. It was by such a release that Missouri was credited (see act of July 17, 1862, in said Senate Ex. Doc. 24, page 197). The same is true as to West Virginia, under the act of February 25, 1867 (Ib., 207). They assumed the debt and sought to have certain credits allowed. Georgia did not assume it, and therefore nothing in their cases authorizes the raising of such an account against Georgia.

"Mr. Lawrence admits that this action of his predecessor is the only obstacle, and that it is not in the way of payment if it was 'unauthorized or void.' If no statute authorized it, it was 'unauthorized.' No statute created such a debt except by the consent of the State, and the State did not consent. There is no pretense that the First Comptroller found such fact upon inquiry. It is only stated that he did an act from which it is inferred that he found such fact. But that does not follow; for he may have raised the account for other reasons. Congress can not make such a debt against a State without its consent. There was no consent, and therefore the act raising such account, when considered as to whether that act made Georgia the debtor, is 'void.'

"We admit that 'all claims or demands whatever by the United States * * * shall be settled and adjusted in the Department of the Treasury' (Rev. Stat. 2236). But there must be a claim or demand to adjust. The statute declared there could be none against a State till it assented, and Georgia never assented. So, while the Second Comptroller must 'examine all accounts' settled by the Auditors (Ib., 273), and the First Auditor 'must examine all accounts accruing in the Treasury Department' (Ib., 277), there must be a debtor, by law, before an account can exist for examination.

"It is useless to examine whether Congress 'may so far declare a State indebted to the United States as to secure satisfaction of the debt by withholding from it by set-off, as in this case, money admitted to be due from the United States to such State,' for Congress has never made such declaration. Nor need we discuss whether Congress had power 'to enforce the collection of tax against the corporate property of the State,' though Mr. Lawrence said 'the power to do so in time of war seems undoubted.' Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, when he presented the direct-tax bill to Congress, in the midst of war and to raise means promptly to prosecute the war, said 'Congress has no constitutional power to assess taxes upon a State. It must assess it upon the individual' (Sen. Ex. Doc. 24, ante, page 41). And the act levying the tax expressly exempted all State property. It sought not to exercise such power if it existed.

"Suppose we admit that Congress might legislate as the eighth head-note declares: Congress has not so legislated in this case. On the contrary, an effort to have it so legislate was defeated. On the 6th of December, 1882, the bill was reached and taken up in the House.

"Mr. Holman, as soon as the report had been read, said:

"'The question is presented whether or not this sum should be paid by the United States directly to the State of Georgia, or whether it shall be allowed as a credit to that State on the amount of direct tax apportioned against the State under the act of August 5, 1861.'

"Mr. Turner replied:

"'The direct tax is a tax due by the people of the State, not by the State in its corporate or aggregate capacity.' &c.—Congressional Record, volume 59, page 59.

"The issue thus made was debated pro and con. Mr. Holman moved to add to the bill—

"'Provided, however, That the said sum, $35,555.42, shall not be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until the sum due the United States of direct taxes apportioned to the State of Georgia under the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, shall have been adjusted.' (Ib., 65.)

"A motion to strike out the enacting clause was lost; the ayes were 52 and the nays were 76.

"Mr. Holman's proposed amendment was also lost by ayes 53 to nays 90. An effort to adjourn was lost by 80 nays to 50 yeas. Upon the passage of the bill the yeas and nays were demanded, and it was passed by yeas 96 to nays 80. (Ib., 68.) The report was read in the Senate, and the bill passed without debate.—Congressional Record, volume 62, pages 3660, 3670-3672.

"Again, we think the payments made to the State of Georgia, aforesaid, were at least waivers of any such claim by the United States as is here asserted, and did set aside and render inoperative said certification of the account in May, 1868, if it ever were operative for the purpose claimed.

"Mr. Lawrence does not claim that the decision of his predecessor was correct. He seems to admit, in the opinion, that he would reverse it if he thought he could. He really suggests this legislation in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883. His language was this:

"'In 1868 the First Comptroller then in office certified balances due to the United States from several States respectively, for direct taxes due and unpaid, under the direct tax act of August 5, 1861 (12 Stat., 292), and such States were accordingly debited on the books in the office of the Register of the Treasury. It may well be doubted whether any corporate State was properly so charged, but as the Comptroller had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, his action, even if erroneous, can not be treated as void by the Comptroller now in office. The result is that money due, or which may become due, from the United States to any State so charged, to the extent of the amount so charged, can not be paid to the State, but, by usage and law, is to be applied by way of set-off. It may thus happen that some States will in this mode pay the direct tax, while others indebted in the same form will continue so indebted; and hence there will seem to be inequality, if not injustice, in the dealings between the United States and such States. The money appropriated by the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 485), "to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1877," was withheld and applied by way of set-off on the sum charged against said State for direct taxes. If it be the purpose of Congress that moneys due to such States shall be paid, it is respectfully suggested that provision should be made authorizing payment without reference to the charge against any such States.'

"Suppose this money can not be paid, and that Mr. Lawrence is right that the judicial courts or Congress can furnish the only relief in such case, if the Comptroller erred in charging the State with such liability; still this bill should pass, and for that very reason. The United States admits this indebtedness to Georgia; it admits Georgia is not in debt to the United States, and it has formally undertaken to pay this debt to Georgia. Why should she be remitted to the Court of Claims? We see no reason therefor.

"By reason of a real or supposed obstacle, unknown to Congress when the bill for payment was passed, the debt of the United States has not been paid. An officer of the United States erroneously put that obstacle in the way. It should be removed, unless there is some other reason to the contrary.

"Is there any? There is none, unless the United States should refuse to pay simply because Georgia did not pay the direct tax. Laying aside the question whether this tax act was operative within the States with which the United States was then at war, a refusal on that ground seems to be unjust for these and other reasons: Georgia does not owe the debt to the United States, but, at most, parts of it are due from certain of her citizens respectively. Only those citizens who in 1861 owned the lands taxed owe the taxes, and no property is bound for the tax except those lands. If Secretary McCulloch was right in his Texas decision, ante, and Mr. Porter was right in the Georgia case, ante, Georgia could not, after a fixed day in 1862, assume the debts, if she wished. Georgia can not collect these taxes without such assumption.

"It does not seem just to collect from Georgia, as a State, any part of a debt she does not owe, nor from her, as representing the land-owners of 1861, by withholding money which belongs to Georgia as a State, and if, as representing any citizens, as representing all her citizens, whether owning lands in 1861 or anything else at any time.

"It does not seem that the United States will ever collect those direct taxes of 1861. But could it and should it determine to do so, equal collections should be made from all the Southern States simultaneously. To make Georgia pay indirectly by withholding from her admitted dues from the United States has not been the policy of the Government, as appears from the payments already of over a quarter of a million of dollars to her in cash since said account was raised in 1868. We do not think it should become the policy of the Government. Therefore, we recommend that the bill do pass."

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the views of the minority (to accompany bill H. R. 3):

The officers of the Treasury are required to, and do, set off sums of money due from the United States to any State against any sums that may be due from the State.

These officers have for many years regarded the unpaid tax levied upon the United States and apportioned among the States by the eighth section of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, as a debt due from the delinquent State, and have treated the same as a proper set-off against any moneys due to said State. Thus the sum of $35,555.42 was appropriated to pay to the State of Georgia, by the act approved March 3, 1883, but the Secretary of the Treasury declined to make such payment, because he found that on the books of the Treasury there was charged against the State of Georgia the sum of $512,959.48, that had been for many years, certainly since the year 1868, regarded as a debt due from the State of Georgia to the United States, being the balance of the direct tax apportioned to said State under the act above referred to and amendments thereto.

House bill No. 3 forbids the officers of the Treasury to treat the unpaid portions of such direct tax as a debt or in any way as a set-off against any claim in favor of any State. The majority of the committee have recommended the passage of the bill. The undersigned are of the opinion that it should not pass, at least until it undergoes material modification.

Accompanying a letter of Hon. Charles J. Folger, late Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, under date of March 29, 1884, was the following:

Nearly $17,500,000 of the original $20,000,000 levied is shown to have been paid, and something more than $2,500,000 now stands charged against fourteen States, more than $2,000,000, of it being against the States of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

It is more than probable that no part of this sum of $2,500,000 will ever be realized by the Government, except as it may be used as a set-off against claims like that of Georgia, first aboved referred to, and the effect of this bill (H. R. No. 3) will, in behalf of all of the delinquent States, be as effective as payment, or a release.

The question is a pertinent one: Why should the delinquent States be released? The majority of the committee answer that the claim against Georgia and the other delinquent States is not a debt due from the State, making a distinction between Georgia as a political corporation, and the whole of the people of Georgia. Indeed, it is claimed that a tax can not be levied upon a State. We do not see why. There might be difficulty in many instance to make collections if the State refused to perform its duty by prompt payment. There are but few of the States that are the owners of real estate beyond that that is used in the performance of the functions of government. The United States is greatly interested in the full performance by each of the States of all the duties imposed upon them, and could not consent to throw any impediment in the way of such performance, as would be the case if the Government should seize the capitol, the prisons, the hospitals, and the colleges belonging to a non-paying State and sell them in order to realize the tax. Hence, in the case of one of the reluctant and non-performing States, the Government crosses the State line and lays hold upon the citizen, levies upon his land, and forces him to make the payment that is due from his State and that is owed by him, and payment of which is forced from him, only because his State is not in such condition as to be forced to pay, except at the expense of its usefulness as a governing factor.

The Federal Government is always forced to deal with the individual when the State refuses the performance of duty. When States were in rebellion they were forced to the resumption of duties through and by the exertions of the Government upon the individual members of the society composing and constituting the State. There is no other medium through which the Government can act. It coerces the State through the individual. Hence the machinery of the law of August 5, 1861, providing for the levy on and sale of the property of individuals and collections from them. If each of the States had been in sympathy and accord with the purposes of the Government, it is more than probable that the sections following the eighth of the act of 1861 would never have been enacted. The Congress would have contented itself with the imposition of the tax upon the United States and "apportionment among the several States." But it was known that several of the States were hostile to the Government; that they would not pay the sum apportioned to them, and for this reason, and in our judgment only for this reason, do we find these provisions in the law that look to the collection of the sums not paid by States from the citizens of the delinquent States. We do not regard these provisions of the act as do the majority, as evidencing a purpose on the part of the law-makers to exempt the State from indebtedness, and impose indebtedness primarily upon the individual citizens composing the State. The practice of our courts illustrates this principle. A debt is due from a county as a political corporation. Its officers refuse payment and refuse to levy a tax to meet a judgment rendered. The court will send the marshal and his deputies to make levies and collections, to lay hold of the individuals composing the political corporation that is derelict in its duty.

But it is said by the report of the majority that the tax can not be a debt due from the States to be relieved because those States had not assumed the debt. We submit that if the power to tax exists it exists independently of consent. In the obligation to pay taxes there are none of the elements of a contract. The power to levy these taxes came from the Constitution. The language is, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes." "Direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States." Not among the people of the several States, but among the States.

If the United States by a levy and apportionment of a direct tax among the States does not impose an obligation, a debt, upon the States, by what right do the States assume such tax and thus impose a burden on the people? The power of a State to levy taxes upon the people is limited to the necessities of its present or prospective indebtedness. These needs alone bound the power of taxation. If the States did not owe, or if it was not certain that at a future day the State would owe, various debts, then we submit the act of taking the people's money through the exercise of the taxing power would be the veriest robbery. What right has the State to assume the individual debt of A, B, or C, its citizens? If this tax was a debt from individuals, where did the several States get the power to assume it? Is the payment of the debts of citizens one of the functions of State government? The property of individuals can only be taken for public uses, but here we find a State seizing the property of one citizen to pay what the majority say is the private debt of an individual to the Government of the United States. It can not be said that the prospect of a 15 per cent. fee can invest the State with the right to become a collecting agent and force its citizens to a payment of their debts, not by the use of the State courts, but by the use of the taxing power of the State.

In our belief the State had no power to assume the debt of another, but being indebted to the United States, it had the power to assume the duty of the levy and collection of such sums of money as would pay the debt, and by so doing relieve the United States from the expense and responsibility of making the collections from many individuals, and by this assumption earn the 15 or 10 per cent. promised in the law.

We are of the opinion that there are many reasons indicating the impolicy of attempts on the part of the United States to collect the sums due from the delinquent States. Yet a large majority of the States have paid their full apportionment. Why should those States which have refused to perform their duty receive rewards that are not bestowed upon those that were faithful to duty?

We are willing that the provisions of House bill No. 3 should be enacted into law, but only on the condition that the States are all placed in an equally just position. If Georgia, that has not paid, is to be released, then Illinois, that has paid in full, should be repaid all she has paid of this direct tax, as well as all of her expenses incurred. The duty of prompt payment of the sums apportioned to each of the States rested upon all alike. It was Georgia's duty to pay promptly just as it was the duty of Illinois. The latter did pay and did discharge in full her indebtedness. The other utterly refused to pay, and now demands, through House bill No. 3, that the United States shall surrender the only means by which it is practicable to force partial and long-deferred payment. We do not believe there is justice in this demand; certainly not without all of the States are restored to the position occupied before the levy was made and the debt imposed.

We favor the restoration of all of the States to the status occupied before the imposition of the tax by the remission of all that part of the $20,000,000 not paid to the States delinquent, and the return of all sums of money paid to the States making the payments, together with the percentage of 10 or 15 per cent. due to the States making collections.

And as a measure that would establish proper relations of equality between the States and Territories in regard to said direct taxes levied, we report the following substitute for House bill No. 3, and recommend its passage.

W. P. HEPBURN.
A. A. RANNEY.
A. X. PARKER.
L. B. CASWELL.

Strike out from House bill No. 3 all after the enacting clause, and insert the following words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to state an account with each of the States and Territories of the United States as they existed on the 5th day of August, 1861, and with the District of Columbia, and in said statement of account he shall place to the credit of each State, Territory, and District all moneys paid by either of them into the Treasury of the United States, or all moneys that were collected by the agents of the United States, from either of them or from their citizens, as direct taxes levied upon the United States, and apportioned among the several States, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendments thereto, and he shall also place to the credit of each State, Territory, and District such sums of money as were earned by any such States, Territories, or District, by reason of collections of said direct taxes made by them and paid into the Treasury of the United States; and said Secretary is directed to pay to each of said States, Territories, or District the sums under said accountings found to be due, and credited to them, respectively, and the said Secretary is further directed to write opposite to any charges of debt that now stands on the books of the Treasury of the United States against any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, by reason of the direct tax above mentioned, the words 'remitted in full,' and the said unpaid portion of said direct tax is hereby remitted in full to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia, and that they are hereby released from all obligation to pay any of the unpaid portions of said tax."

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, until that report is in the possession of the House and the views of the minority have been seen by the different members discussion upon them will not be so well understood. There are other gentlemen here who desire to speak on the general topic, or incidentally connected with it, who do not desire to discuss the particular views expressed in these papers; and hence I will reserve the time to which I am entitled, and allow those gentlemen to proceed this morning. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] wishes to speak upon the subject, as his State is interested in the matter. I will therefor yield the floor to him, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, it has been ascertained and officially stated that there are moneys due by the United States to certain States which have been withheld in consequence of balances alleged to be due from those States to the General Government for direct taxes under the act of August 2, 1861. Mississippi is one of the States to which there is acknowledged indebtedness by the United States, and she, in common with the rest, is seeking the relief which the pending bill will afford. The amount which is shown to be due her by the report of First Comptroller Durham is $41,453.91. This sum is due the State by virtue of acts of Congress passed March 1, 1817, and September 4, 1841, providing that 2 and 5 per cent. on the net proceeds of lands sold within the State shall be paid to the State for internal-improvement purposes.

Section 1766, Revised Statutes, says that—

No money shall be paid to any person for his compensation who is in arrears to the United States, until he has accounted for and paid into the Treasury all sums for which he may be liable.

First Comptroller Durham, in his report of October 16, 1885, page 14, states that under this section the accounting officers of the Treasury have been applying the proceeds arising from the sale of these lands to the credit of the State on her indebtedness to the United States.

It is clear that this is a strained and improper construction. The act of 1861 operates only upon the property of individuals. The tax was imposed upon lands within the geographical limits of the State by persons residing in the State, and in part by citizens of other States. Moreover, the Government, by discontinuing the collection of the tax, discharged the owners of the property from its payment and virtually canceled their indebtedness. I will cite the following order of the Secretary of the Treasury of July 28, 1866:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 3, 1866.

SIR: Section 14 of an act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes, approved July 28, 1866, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the collection, in any of the States hereafter declared in insurrection, of the direct tax imposed by an act of Congress passed August 5, 1861, until January 1, 1868.

By virtue of the authority conferred upon me by this provision of law, I hereby direct the suspension of the collection of the above-mentioned direct tax in all the States hereafter in insurrection.

You will please give the necessary instructions to direct-tax commissioners.

In connection with this subject, I have to request your opinion as to whether the employment of all persons engaged, in whatever capacity, in the collection of the direct tax may not properly and usefully be suspended.

Respectfully, yours,

HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. E. A. ROLLINS,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The policy indicated by this order has been continued up to the present date.

But admitting, for the sake of argument, and for argument only, that these "arrears" still exist, the pretension that the State is responsible for the alleged delinquency of "persons" is wholly indefensible. It would be as reasonable to charge the State with the arrears of a person who, in the exercise of a trust under the government, had failed to pay over moneys belonging to it. The language of the law shows that it was designed to operate, not upon the State, but upon the "person." In the collection of taxes, the United States deals with the individual and not with the State. It is a historical fact that one of the main objects of the convention to frame a "more perfect union" than existed under the Confederation, was to get rid of the system of calling upon the States for revenue to support the common government, and for this reason the States delegated to the United States the power to enact measures operating directly upon the individual. Under the Confederation each State was bound to furnish its quota for the maintenance of the common government. The plan was insufficient. Mr. Madison, whose conspicuous part in the formation of the existing government is historical, explained the change of the system in the following language:

The change relating to taxation may be regarded as the most important, and yet the present Congress have as complete authority to require of the States indefinite supplies of money for the common defense and general welfare as the future Congress will have to require them of individual citizens. (Federalist, forty-fifth chapter.)

Hence, with a view to enable the General Government to deal directly with the individual, it was provided in the Constitution that Congress should have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and to provide for the general welfare—a sovereign power which the States delegated to form "a more perfect union." Nothing can be added to the forcible exposition of this subject by Mr. Webster:

The Constitution creates direct relations between this Government and individuals. It has power to tax individuals. The maintenance of the Constitution does not depend on the plighted faith of the States as States to support it. It relies on individual duty and obligation. In the articles of confederation the States did make promises, but in the Constitution there is nothing of the kind. It does not exact from the State any plighted faith to maintain it. On the contrary, it makes its own preservation depend on individual duty and individual obligation. I have always said that to obtain a power of direct legislation over the people was always prominent as a reason for getting rid of the confederation and forming a new Constitution. Under the confederation Congress had only power to make requisitions on States, and if the States declined compliance, as they did, there was no remedy but war. The Constitution was adopted to avoid this necessity. It was adopted that there might be a Government which could act directly on individuals without borrowing aid from the State governments. This is as clear as light itself.

In 1862 Congress passed a supplemental act superseding the act of 1861 as to the Southern States. The Supreme Court has decided that it created a lien on the lands (9 Wall., 336, and 14 Wall., 553). If it is undeniable that a State can not be taxed and was not intended to be taxed, how can it be held responsible for taxes levied upon the property of individuals?

But to leave no ground whatever for the occupancy of those who maintain that the sum certified to be due the States by the United States should be set off by the alleged arrears of individuals, some of whom were never residents thereof, and a still larger number of whom have gone to that bourn whence no traveler returns, it is only necessary to adduce the following conclusive reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the proposition of the State of Texas to settle the taxes which had been levied upon property within its boundaries:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 28, 1866.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 14, in which you inclose a copy of an act of the Legislature of Texas assuming payment of the uncollected portion of the direct tax due from Texas under the provisions of the law of June 7, 1862. You ask for a statement showing the amount collected and the sum still due. The law under which this tax has been collected contains no provision authorizing its assumption by a State, the permissory clause of the act of August 5, 1861, not having been re-enacted in that of June 7, 1862. In the absence of such a provision this Department would not be justified in recognizing such assumption. In my annual report of December, 1865, I recommended that sales under this law should be suspended until the States interested had an opportunity of assuming payment of the tax, but this recommendation has only been so far carried out as to authorize the suspension of collections for a definite time, no provision for assuming the debt being contained in the law which gives authority for such suspension.

Under such circumstances it is unnecessary to reply in detail to that portion of your letter which asks for a statement of collections, or to your suggestion for the acceptance of Texas indemnity bonds in part payment.

Respectfully yours,

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. W. THROCKMORTON,
Governor of Texas.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 13, 1867.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of February 19, proposing a plan for payment of the direct taxes still due by citizens of Texas to the United States. As the plan proposed proceeds wholly upon the assumption that payment of their taxes may be accepted from the State government, I am under the necessity of calling your attention to the inclosed copy of my former letter of December 28, 1866; a letter which from the tenor of that just received must, I fear, have failed to reach you.

As the direct-tax laws remain unchanged since that letter was written, I have only to repeat that this Department is not at liberty to accept payment in any other manner or through any other agencies than as proposed in those laws.

Respectfully, yours,

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. W. THROCKMORTON,
Governor of Texas, Austin, Tex.

Here it will be seen that the application of Texas to settle the alleged "arrears" of taxes on the lands within her boundaries was distinctly refused.

In further support of the position which I have taken in favor of the bill to authorize the settlement of these claims, and the removal of obstacles which only the weakest quibbling could have suggested, I will cite the able and unanswerable reasoning of First Comptroller A. G. Porter, in his decision upon the case of Georgia, precisely analogous to that of Mississippi, which led up to the conclusion that it was his "duty to direct that the sum appropriated (under the direct tax law) to the State of Georgia shall not be credited as upon a debt owing by that State to the United States, but shall be paid at once to the State." (Decision of the First Comptroller, May 24, 1879, Executive Document 24, Forty-sixth Congress.)

And finally, Mr. Speaker, the United States created the obligation to the State of Mississippi for the specific purpose nominated in the bond, and can not divert the sums due her without violating its plighted faith. It would be far greater honor to moderate its own demands than to incur the hazard of trenching upon the rights of others. Can this Government, illimitable in its resources, and as powerful to maintain its pledges inviolate as to enforce its authority, afford to plant itself upon the Rob Roy doctrine—

> The simple plan
> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can?

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if this bill and its effect upon our revenues and upon the several States were thoroughly understood it would have but little support in this House. I am obliged to go briefly over the history of the matter, and I will do so as rapidly as I can, avoiding as far as possible circumstances already referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

On the 5th of August, 1861, this Government found it necessary to secure a fund which it did not possess. It adopted the plan of assessing, not upon the individuals of a State, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] has said, but upon the United States, a tax of $20,000,000, which was apportioned among the several States of the Union. The President was authorized to divide the various States and Territories and the District of Columbia into convenient collection and assessment districts. All the paraphernalia and machinery of law were provided, and it was further enacted that where a State voluntarily assumed the payment of the debt there should be an allowance of 15 per cent. within a given time and 10 per cent. within another period, as the Government would thus be saved the necessity of putting the machinery of collection into motion.

Now, that law stands to-day upon the statute-book unrepealed. Its constitutionality may have been doubted; but it has never yet been decided to be unconstitutional. Under it $2,647,000 remain yet unpaid; the balance has been paid into the Treasury of the United States by a portion of the States for the good of the whole.

The SPEAKER. The hour devoted to this order of business has expired.

Mr. PRICE. Then I shall have the floor when the subject comes up again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] will then be entitled to the floor.

RETIREMENT OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. DINGLEY obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who desires to make a motion.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, on a previous day a bill from the Naval Committee was pending on a motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] to recommit it.

The SPEAKER. That is the unfinished business. If the gentleman desires, it must be disposed of under the rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is that business in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is unfinished business of the House, and under the rules a motion to go into Committee of the Whole generally is in order after the unfinished business is disposed of. The Clerk will report the title of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 339) authorizing the voluntary retirement of officers of the United States Navy who have rendered conspicuous service in battle or who have served thirty years in the Navy.

The SPEAKER. This comes over as unfinished business, and the pending question is upon the motion to recommit to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HERBERT. On that I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to recommit was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] will take the chair temporarily in the absence of the regular chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. OATES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the bill which is the first business in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4333) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that this bill may be passed over, in order that the bill of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] may be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois requests that this bill may be passed over for the present. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

AMENDMENT OF SHIPPING LAWS.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read the following amendment, offered yesterday by Mr. HOLMAN:

Provided, however, That no collector or other officer of customs, inspector, or shipping commissioner shall receive from the Treasury of the United States, in salary, fees, or other compensation for services connected with his office above enumerated, a greater sum in the aggregate than $6,000 per annum, except the collector of the port of New York, whose salary and compensation in the aggregate shall not exceed $12,000 per annum.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] offered this amendment I reserved a point of order to it. I do not see that gentleman in his seat, but understand he will be here in a moment. He is now in the House and I will proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will reserve the point of order until the gentleman from Indiana can be heard, if he has anything further to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know of no reason, so far as I am concerned, why the point of order should not be disposed of. In some remarks made by me last evening I stated that I had offered this amendment simply out of abundant caution. The provisions of the first section of the bill throw upon the public Treasury the payment of all these charges, and it seems to me to be desirable on our part to avoid any possibility of increase in the compensation of officers connected with the customs-revenue service. The highest salary paid, so far as it appears on the face of the papers before Congress, to any collector of customs is to the collector of the port of New York, who receives $12,000 a year. The collector of the port of Philadelphia receives $8,000, and the collector of New Orleans and I believe the collector of Baltimore get $7,000 per annum. The salaries then run down to comparatively small figures.

Now my proposition, Mr. Chairman, does not interfere with the salary of the collector of the port of New York as fixed by law, but it would have the effect to change the salaries of three or four collectors. But that is not its main purpose, which is to prevent any possibility in the change proposed of calls upon the Treasury, so as to increase salaries beyond what is now paid to these collectors of customs.

The whole system is full of confusion, and I only excuse myself for submitting the amendment because of the necessity to guard against increase of salaries. As to the salaries of the collectors of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, which will be affected by my amendment, they are manifestly above what is paid for corresponding services in other branches of the Government. Take as a parallel salaries paid in the internal revenue or to the assistant treasurers of the United States or in the subtreasury, and compared with them these salaries are too high. It is a system made up by piecemeal in the way of legislation from time to time. It has not been subjected to revision, and I am apprehensive the present Congress will pass without any remedy being applied to the present confused condition of these salaries.

On the point of order, I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that from my standpoint it is well taken. It is a limitation of the section itself, which provides for the payment of these fees out of the Treasury of the United States. My amendment declares the sums paid to the collectors and other officers of the customs service shall not in any event exceed a given amount per annum. That is the only effect of the proposition. It is only a limitation of the amount to be received from the public Treasury, and nothing more.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to ask him, as he has examined the matter somewhat, what officers, in his judgment, would be affected by his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I sought to explain that matter. The salary of the collector of the port of Philadelphia is $8,000, and the salary of the collectors of the ports of New Orleans, Chicago, and possibly Boston, is, I believe, $7,000. They are the only salaries above $6,000. It does not affect the salary of the collector of the port of New York, and fixing the salaries at New Orleans, Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago at $6,000, as compared with other salaries of officers of equal responsibility, is up, in my judgment, to the full measure of what has been deemed fitting and proper. I concede as to New York, from which a large portion of our revenue is derived, the salary now provided for the collector of that port is excusable, if not justifiable.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out the last word.

A MEMBER. What about the point of order?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before I urge the point of order I wish to call attention to the objection of the committee to the attempt made to place upon this bill an amendment of this character, as it is an endeavor to deal with a subject which has not yet been investigated by any committee, namely, salaries of collectors of customs throughout the country. I hold in my hand a scheme submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for determining salaries of these officers, which has been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman refer to the last report, which came in yesterday?

Mr. DINGLEY. I refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury submitted January 16, just printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. That has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DINGLEY. Whatever may be the effect of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, it is trenching upon a subject which no committee of this House has yet investigated, and which, before any action shall be taken, ought to be carefully examined by some committee. This bill does not propose to deal at all with the subject of salaries of collectors or other officers, but provides practically it shall not affect salaries.

I notice in the report submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, outlining the plan he recommends, that he fixes the salary of the collector of customs at $8,000 for Boston; $8,000 for the appraiser of New York, which would be affected by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, $8,000 for the naval officer, $8,000 for the surveyor, and $8,000 for the collector at Philadelphia; $7,000 for the collector at Baltimore, $7,000 for the collector at Chicago, and $7,000 for the collector at San Francisco. Now, with reference to all of these officers, certainly the gentleman's amendment would cut down the salaries to a lower figure than that recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

But, Mr. Chairman, my objection is not to that point so much; it is rather to the attempt to deal with this subject without investigation, and an investigation that certainly its importance ought to suggest. And I hope and would appeal to the gentleman from Indiana, in view of all the circumstances, as this matter is to go before some committee of the House to be carefully considered, that he withdraw his amendment at the present time and allow it to come up in regular order after due investigation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I not only withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman, but I move to strike out the last clause for the purpose of saying a word as to why I withdraw it.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is understood that the point of order is still pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has withdrawn his proposed amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not so understand the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to be a member of the committee which reported this bill, and I regret very much, sir, that I have not been able to perform the duties I owed to the committee in reference to the consideration of the bill before it was reported to the House. I ought not, perhaps, to feel justified in saying a word in reference to the bill, not having had the opportunity of devoting more time to its consideration while it was pending in the committee, but I I do not feel entirely satisfied with the measure in its present form.

In the attempt to relieve our ships and shipping, a project which has been engaging the attention of Congress for thirteen or fourteen years, I think some very important questions affecting the shipping interests have been largely overlooked, and that the efforts we have made have produced no important results, while throwing material burdens upon the general trade and the people at large. We relieved this shipping interest, not only external but our internal shipping as well, from hospital dues, which involved a very considerable sum of money, and threw its burden upon the people through the Federal Treasury. Now, it is a very difficult thing to see how the Federal Treasury should be any more required to bear that particular burden than a burden in connection with any other of the active industries of the country involving the employment of large bodies of men.

This bill proposes to relieve the shipping interests, not the foreign alone but the inland shipping as well, of all exactions which have been deemed necessary and wise in the past for the maintenance of a careful system of police, so to speak, or police regulations, not only for the benefit of the owners of steamboats and vessels themselves, but for the benefit of the general public as a measure of security for life as well as property. The ship-owner is interested in this matter just as well as the general public. It is a protection to his property. The action taken in this respect in former years, although it has been deemed necessary, has not apparently affected any very material results, and I must confess that I do not indulge much hope, with all due respect to the gentleman from Maine and his intelligence and information upon this subject, that this kind of an expedient will give any very great vigor to our shipping interests.

Especially I do not see how it can stimulate these industries upon our Western rivers and lakes, where our vessels do not come in competition with the vessels of other nations. I have not myself heard these fees complained of by the shipping interests in that region. I have the honor to represent a district largely engaged in steamboat building, ship-owning, and the running of steamboats; and yet I have not heard that this is a subject of complaint.

But, sir, the point of my objection really is the tendency to take off from particular industries the exactions which somebody is compelled to bear and throw the whole weight upon the Federal Treasury. The tendency is always in the direction of promoting certain industries and by indirect subsidies, so to speak. I think that my friend from Maine, on examining carefully some of the charges which are proposed to be removed from vessels, sail-vessels, steam-vessels, and steamboats, and throwing them upon the Federal Treasury, will reach the conclusion, ultimately, that they are in the main such charges as the owners of the ship or vessel is interested in paying for his own sake and for the safety and security of his own property. But, sir, as I have said, I am placed in a somewhat embarrassed position on this bill, as I was not able to go into the committee at the time it was being considered, and, therefore, do not stand upon an equal footing with gentlemen who have had a better opportunity of knowing its provisions.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DUNN. I offer an amendment to strike out the last words of the bill for the purpose of answering some of the remarks of my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

He takes three points of objection; one that a mass of charges are taken off the shipping interests and cast upon the Treasury, and, as connected with that, that it is an indirect subsidy; and another, and finally, that he does not see that that will relieve the shipping interests. Now, with all kind regard and due consideration as well as deference to the gentleman from Indiana, I must say that his conclusions, when carefully considered, must appear exceedingly illogical. The shipping interests of this country have been undergoing a steady decline for more than twenty-five years. A large mass of the taxes imposed upon the shipping interests which we are seeking to remove were imposed during the war for revenue. They were war taxes and a necessary incident to the levying of war taxes. They have been imposed for the purposes of the Government and not for the benefit of the shipping interests or vessel-owners. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Navigation both state that fact.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Arkansas will permit me, I think he has right there touched the very heart of this question, and I would be glad, therefore, if he would explain two things: First, is this a tax that was levied after the war or during the war—were these taxes levied during the war, or did they exist before; and second, were they levied for the public interests generally, or do they exist, any of them, for the special benefit of the ship-owner? If so, then it seems to me they should bear the actual cost; but if it is a matter of public interest or public regulation, and not for their special benefit alone, then I see no impropriety in the expenditure being borne by the public Treasury.

Mr. DUNN. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Navigation both report, and I will read from the report, that this entire mass of charges should be relieved.

The revenue collected—

And I read from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation—

The revenue collected from these sources, while inconsiderable in its aggregate amount, is regarded as a burden from which the ship-owners should be relieved, and it is recommended to abolish the fees entirely. The officers of the customs, whose compensation is dependent on this collection, the steamboat inspection service and the shipping service, should be provided for out of moneys not otherwise appropriated. Most of the service performed by the Government officers, for which the fees are collected, are not specially beneficial to the ship-owner, but are for the protection of the revenue, or of the public, or of the seamen, or for statistical purposes, and there is no reason why the ship-owner should bear the burden.

Mr. DUNN. Now, on yesterday the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] sought to pick out of this list of fees abolished—for we have specified those which shall be abolished distinctively and have left no discretion anywhere—he sought to pick out of that list some items as to which he doubted if they were for the public interest, and made a question whether they were not for the benefit of the ship-owner, among which he named a bill of health and others, all of which were manifestly for the public interest and for public purposes. The Government laid during the war tonnage taxes, licenses, occupation taxes, as well as income taxes, which reached the vessel and its earnings and reached the officers and employés of the vessel and their occupation and affected the revenue.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. DUNN.

Mr. DUNN. And these charges have been laid in order to enable the Government to keep their control of the matter and for public purposes entirely and alone. Now, I have a statement here from the Commissioner of Navigation, showing that, including the deterioration, the taxes now raised upon the shipping interests of the country reached the enormous sum of 14½ or 15 per cent. There is not another property interest in the country resting under any such burden of taxation. We reduced their burdens last year by more than half a million dollars by the reduction of tonnage and change of fees, and we cast the burden of fees that were to remain upon the Government hospital dues for sailors. Why, the hospitals for the sailors have sprung out of the common sentiment of humanity of the whole civilized world that takes care of the sailor. He is a homeless creature; he has no home anywhere, except upon the shore upon which he may be cast by the exigencies of his avocation. The world has provided for him a hospital at the common expense of all the civilized maritime nations of the world.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him, is not that correct solely as to the hospital system in connection with foreign commerce?

Mr. DUNN. I have been referring to the act of 1884. But that was not cast upon the Treasury; that was charged upon the tonnage tax that remained unrepealed; and that part which now falls upon the Treasury is below $50,000, for this year the tonnage dues will meet all the hospital charges except $39,000 or $40,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. But does not the necessity of maintaining the hospital system, which has always been recognized, apply to the foreign commerce rather than to the local internal commerce, which stands upon a common basis with other employments?

Mr. DUNN. We are not maintaining any internal hospitals that I am aware of; but we ought to maintain more hospitals than we do.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are maintaining several.

Mr. DUNN. It is as important to protect the internal shipping interest as it is the foreign shipping interest. Our foreign carrying trade has been swept from the seas by taxation as well as by the restrictions of trade, which rob shipping of the opportunity to get cargoes everywhere. There is but one road to relief, and that is to remove taxation, remove the restrictions, remove burdens, and open the way for our people to do shipping business at a profit. Until that is made possible they will never do it. Can it be supposed that American capital will engage in a business that is burdened with a tax of 14½ per cent.?

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state the items that make that up?

Mr. DUNN. It includes deterioration, and it does not include what we have removed heretofore. Local taxation, municipal and otherwise, 2.3 per cent.; tonnage tax, 1 per cent.; fees, .1 per cent.; deterioration, 10 per cent.; pilotage, 1.5 per cent.

Mr. HOLMAN. The deterioration forms a large proportion of it.

Mr. DUNN. Besides, there is a constant and ever-increasing tendency to add new taxes in the way of imposing new inventions upon vessels for life-saving and all other imaginary beneficial services. Why, sir, last year, as chairman of the subcommittee on commerce, to whom measures relating to commerce and navigation were referred, if I had favored the measures propounded there, and pressed upon my subcommittee, to compel ship-owners to take new inventions, life-saving boats, life-saving dresses, life-saving machinery, and had secured their enactment into law, every ship-owner in America would have set his vessel on fire and fled from it by night.

Mr. DUNN. I would like a little more time to have this communication read. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I renew it, and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. DUNN. Now, I wish to answer one more point made by the gentleman from Indiana. If the removal of taxation is indirect subsidy, God save the country; there is an end of all arguments for reducing taxation. To whom is it a subsidy? To what is it a subsidy? All the taxes that rest upon the shipping and carrying trade of the country enter into and swell the cost of the products of the country which they transport and move and swell the cost of all products imported into the country, so that the burden of cost falls upon the producer and the consumer, the original producer being the heaviest sufferer.

If he is subsidized, I want to subsidize in that way every laborer in this nation of fifty-five millions of people; I want to subsidize every consumer of the tax-burdened commodities that enter into our national consumption. That is the subsidy policy that I am for. I am opposed to all subventions in the legitimate and proper acceptation and meaning of that term, but I am for removing all burdens of taxation which may be removed consistently with the needs of the revenues of the Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the communication which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request I herewith send you statement of the benefit derived from shipping legislation proposed and already enacted. The items go far toward placing our ships in a position to compete with foreign vessels; but as remarked by you in conversation on Saturday, nearly all of such relief from burdens comes ultimately to the pockets of the producer and the consumer, so that I think such measures should be considered as removing war taxes and burdens upon the commerce of the country at large.

Yours, very truly,

JARVIS PATTEN.

Hon. POINDEXTER DUNN,
Chairman of Committee on Shipping, House of Representatives.

Memorandum regarding taxation on American vessels.

	Per cent.
Local taxes, municipal and otherwise	2.3
Tonnage tax	1.0
Fees	.1
Depreciation per annum	10.0
Pilotage	1.5
Total	14.9

In addition, there are charges for port warden (no estimate), harbor dues (no estimate), quarantine and local dues (no estimate).

The local taxation of 2.3 per cent. is imposed at a certain town in the State of Maine. I am informed that on the lakes and in some other States this would be about a fair average.

Vessel property is subject to more depreciation than most other kinds and to greater risks. In the foreign trade especially they have to compete with the cheapest vessels of the world, and should therefore be relieved of all unnecessary burdens, otherwise the business of shipping in the United States, so far as regards foreign trade, must be altogether discontinued. The total tonnage tax collected during the year 1885 from all vessels was $390,875.15; from vessels of the United States $59,325.29. The entire customs fees for that period were $500,444.20, of which probably nearly one-third was paid for services to United States vessels, namely, $166,814.73. The amount paid for the last fiscal year by the Government to consular officers, under the provision of the act of June 26, 1884, abolishing consular fees, in the case of vessels of the United States, is stated in the report of the Fifth Auditor to have been $15,511.73. The whole sum this provision saved to the owners of vessels amounted to about $90,000.

The fees received by shipping commissioners and deposited in the Treasury as a fund for their compensation amounted to $61,484.12, of which $53,248.24 were expended in salaries, rents, &c. The fees deposited for inspection and license in the case of steam-vessels amounted to $111,468.85.

It will be seen from the foregoing that property in vessels is very highly taxed, and it is necessarily subject to many restrictions under existing legislation. The fees sought to be abolished by bill 4838 are an additional burden. They have been paid by the vessels without any recompense for the use of the Government. Should they be abolished, the Government, of course, would have to provide for the officers paid therefrom. This provision, as estimated above, would cost, say, for—

United States shipping commissioners, their clerks, &c.	$53,248 24
Steamboat service	111,468 85
Fees to customs officers*	166,814 33
Total	331,531 42

*The amount mentioned as paid for services to vessels generally include services to foreign vessels as well as to those of the United States, and as the fees for foreign vessels are not abolished by the bill, the amount would be considerably less than that above stated.

This comparatively small amount might well be collected in some other manner if necessary.

Statement of amount saved to United States vessels, &c., during the year ending June 30, 1885, by the passage of the act of June 26, 1884.

	Saved to foreign vessels.	Saved to American vessels.
Tonnage tax	$692,109	$213,788
Hospital tax	.....	421,348
Consular fees	.....	90,000
	692,109	724,136

The relief afforded by the passage of the bill would not only go to the ships, but also to the shippers and the producers, in consequence of the reduction in freight charges which necessarily follows a reduction in expenses of transportation.

It is admitted by all economists that taxes of this kind, although borne directly by the ship, are really burdens on the commerce of the country that levies them, and in the end fall upon the shipper, to be paid by the producer. In my experience as a ship-master, a case of the kind came directly under my observation in the cotton trade, where it is the custom for ships to pay the cost of compressing the bales. At this time, in the port of New Orleans, the rate of compressing had risen to $1 per bale, while freights were low. All at once the combination among the different cotton-presses was broken and a spirit of competition introduced among them, when the rates of compressing fell to 50 cents per bale. This at first appeared to be good news to the captains who were loading cotton, as they expected to make a saving of 50 cents per bale expense in loading, but it was soon found that this was not to be so, as in course of a week the rate of freight adjusted itself to the change and vessels were accepting just 50 cents less per bale for carrying the cotton. The relief afforded shipping by this bill tends to enable them to compete with foreign ships which are not assessed in like manner, but although the money be first paid by the ship, it falls ultimately on the commodities carried, and so upon the producer. The relief voted is virtually to take off a burden on the commerce and production of the whole country, rather than to relieve ship-owners alone. The amount of a million dollars taxes taken off shipping may sound large, but when it is acknowledged, as it must be, that the million dollars is ultimately scattered through the whole country, going mostly to the producers of every commodity that is exported, it will be seen the measure is a relief to the whole country from taxes established years ago as a war measure.

During the reading of the foregoing paper the chairman announced that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] had expired; whereupon

Mr. OATES took the floor in opposition to the amendment and yielded his time to Mr. DUNN.

Mr. DUNN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the statement just read shows that by the act of 1884 burdens to the amount of something more than a million dollars were taken off the shipping interests of the United States. It is estimated that this bill will reduce burdens in the form of fees, &c., to the amount of about $300,000. The tonnage provision of the bill, if it is responded to by foreign governments, will sweep away the balance of tonnage taxes, amounting to some $400,000. Then if we shall be able to follow up this reduction of near $2,000,000 by a reduction in the cost of pilotage, which now amounts to perhaps more than $2,000,000, we shall have accomplished a great deal for the relief of American shipping interests and shall have done much to open the way to the resumption of that kind of business by American enterprise and American capital. Then, if we shall be able to follow that up with a great crowning measure to give them free ships, the cheapest that may be made in the world, the entire restoration of American dominance upon the seas in the carrying trade will have been made possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DUNN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend perceive that this reduction affects very largely vessels owned abroad as well as those owned at home?

Mr. DUNN. It does not affect vessels owned abroad except as to tonnage. The act of 1884 reduced tonnage dues to certain foreign vessels. This bill does not release one dollar of tonnage dues to any foreign vessel except in consideration of a like reduction by other nations to American vessels.

Mr. HOLMAN. But does not the gentleman see that to the extent that foreign vessels are released the burden is put upon our people?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir. We take off burdens from the American consumer in this way, just as you do by taking off tariff taxes.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the same principle?

Mr. DUNN. Exactly. The effect is just as direct.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to get an opportunity to make a few remarks upon this bill. I am not very familiar with the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] evidently is, as well as the gentleman from Maine. I do not propose to say much about it. In many of its provisions, if not all, it may be well enough. Like many other members of this House, in much of the legislation that comes before us I follow in the main the committee that reports the bill. I want to say, however, that I regretted that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], at the first fire, withdrew the amendment he offered yesterday, which tended to limit the compensation of customs collectors, because it is known in a general way to the country, from repeated assertion through long years past, that many of these officers do receive a very large compensation. It is known further that there are a good many collection districts, many more than most of us are aware of; and, as I have said, it is known that the compensation of the collectors in some of these districts is very large—in some instances, as I am informed, as high as ten thousand or twelve thousand or fifteen thousand dollars a year. Now, I regretted to see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withdraw his amendment, because the millennium has come, the time has arrived when the gentleman has a President in harmony with himself and a majority of 40 in this House, and when he has an opportunity to run matters, and glorify his party, and keep some of the promises that he has been making for the last twenty-five years. I hope he will not be obstructed in doing that.

In all seriousness, I do believe that a great reform might be made, and ought to be made, touching the collection of the revenues and the cost of that service. I hope that nobody will put any obstacle in the way of the gentleman from Indiana, and the other side of the House, in making these reforms. In season and out of season—upon this bill or any other bill—let them be made.

Mr. DINGLEY. If we can pass immediately to the other sections of the bill I will not move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate; but I see there is a little tendency to run into outside questions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I congratulate my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] upon the manifest improvement not only in his way of speaking but in his theories of economy. He always speaks well; but on this occasion he has spoken with unusual animation and energy. My friend must have perceived that the amendment I offered and which was, from the necessities of the case, but a partial remedy, affecting a very few salaries, was withdrawn because the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] was apprehensive that his bill would be embarrassed; and surely the gentleman from Illinois does not wish to embarrass the measure of the gentleman from Maine. Besides, I indulge the hope that a measure comprehensive enough to embrace all the salaries of the customs service will be brought in during the present session of Congress; and I trust the gentleman from Illinois will give it a cheerful support.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That shipping commissioners may ship and discharge crews for any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade, or the trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland, or the West Indies, or the Republic of Mexico, at the request of the master or owner of such vessel, the shipping and discharging fees in such cases to be one-half that prescribed by section 4612 of the Revised Statutes, for the purpose of determining the compensation of shipping commissioners.

SEC. 3. That section 10 of the act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, be amended by inserting after the word "relative," in line 19, the following: "Or to an original creditor in liquidation of any just debt for board or clothing which he may have contracted prior to engagement, not exceeding one month's pay for board and one month's pay for clothing." And said section 10 is further amended by striking out all of the last paragraph after the words "vessels of the United States," and inserting in lieu of such words stricken out the following: "And any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated this section shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for a similar violation."

SEC. 4. That section 4289 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4289. The provisions of the seven preceding sections, and of section 18 of an act entitled 'An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes,' approved June 26, 1884, relating to the limitations of the liability of the owners of vessels, shall apply to all sea-going vessels, and also to all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, but shall not apply to any canal-boat, barge, or lighter."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 11 and 12 of section 4 the words "but shall not apply to any," and insert the words "including canal-boats, barges, and lighters."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, just about the time that the committee was rising yesterday afternoon, I proposed this amendment, which is printed in the RECORD. I desire to occupy a moment or two in explanation of it, and I trust the Committee of the Whole will see the propriety of adopting it.

This bill, as reported by the Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, does not include in its limited-liability clause canal-boats, barges, or lighters, but on the contrary they are excepted from its provisions. I need not say to the House that since the original laws affecting these interests were passed the business of lighterage and tugboating has become an immense business in all parts of the country—in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and elsewhere; and I can see no reason why this bill should not be now amended so as to include this class of vessels. They are certainly liable to be damaged by collision and otherwise. There is certainly value in these vessels—of course not great value, but more or less value. Yet they are not within the limitations of this bill, and I think they should be included, in deference to the desire of those interested in tugboats, barges, and lighters.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], the Shipping Committee has maintained the exception which has always been observed in our limited-liability law. The exception now embraced in the Revised Statutes as to canal-boats, barges, or lighters is an exception which was placed in the first limited-liability act passed in 1851, and I wish merely to restate the reasons which then governed the action of Congress.

The limited liability was granted to vessels mainly on these grounds: First, that the vessel goes beyond the control of its immediate owner, and can not be under his immediate care; secondly, that it encounters peculiar and exceptional perils of navigation; and, thirdly, that it is in the interest of public policy to grant this exceptional privilege to the owners of shipping property. It was argued that these exceptions did not apply, at least in their ordinary force, to canal-boats, barges, and lighters—first, because these vessels are usually employed in a harbor or on a canal, and do not meet the ordinary perils of navigation; secondly, that they are always, when moved, attachments of other vessels; and, thirdly, that as the limited-liability act provided that the aggregate measure of liability should be the value of the vessel and pending freight, these vessels afforded a small measure of aggregate liability.

Those, in substance, were the reasons which led Congress, in passing the original limited-liability act, to except these three classes of vessels. Having stated the reasons which then controlled the judgment of Congress, I leave to the Committee of the Whole to determine this question as may seem to it proper.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not see that we need be bound by the judgment of the Congress which enacted the law of 1852. In our day tugboating and lighterage, the use of canal-boats with lighters, &c., in our rivers and other streams, has become in many parts of our country a greatly extended business. Now, I do not think that the question of the measure of damage which might be incurred by a canal-boat or tugboat or a lighter should enter into this question at all. There is no reason why the owner should not be compensated for damages.

In trying to pass this bill amendatory of our shipping laws—and I sincerely hope we shall succeed in passing it—I do not see why we should not seek to put the law in as good a shape as possible, a shape suited to the business of the times. I wish to urge the Committee of the Whole to adopt this amendment. I had hoped that the gentleman in charge of the bill might assent to it. I know he could not accept it as chairman of the committee and acting under their instructions, yet perhaps a word or two from him might have given the Committee of the Whole a more favorable idea of this proposition. But I repeat, the fact that the act of 1852, passed thirty-four years ago, excepted these canal-boats, barges, and lighters from the limited-liability clause is no reason why now, with the experience of the intervening years, we should not allow these vessels to be included in the provisions of the limited-liability law. The smaller interests of the parties owning these vessels are just as important to them as the larger interests of larger vessel-owners. We are seeking to do the best we can for American shipping; and we now have an opportunity to include these vessels in the provisions of the general law on this subject. No sufficient reason is presented in favor of continuing the exception which was made years ago. I ask this Committee of the Whole to adopt this amendment. It can certainly do no wrong to any one. It can not affect adversely the shipping interests. It does not impose any additional fee upon any one. It simply gives to the owners of these smaller vessels the same rights that are accorded to the owners of larger vessels.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I certainly hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be adopted. In 1852 the tonnage of a canal-boat was from 60 to 80 tons. Now they carry from 200 to 300. In 1852 they simply navigated canals. Now a canal-boat takes a load at Quebec or Ottawa and delivers it at New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. The whole system of transportation has changed, and it is as important to accommodate shippers on the lakes, rivers, and canals as any others. Therefore I sincerely hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be adopted.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Chairman, I understand the effect of this section, if adopted, will be to extend to vessels engaged in lake and other inland navigation the same exemption from liability which the owners of vessels engaged in ocean navigation enjoy under the act of 1851. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] says that the legislation already upon the statute-book extends to lake navigation. If so, the effect of this section will be to extend it to carriers on rivers.

A MEMBER. And canals.

Mr. BOYLE. Yes; and canals.

I think, sir, the policy of this legislation from the beginning is doubtful. The effect of it is to relieve common carriers by water almost entirely from their liability as such. It goes even beyond that. It not only relieves the carrier from his common-law liability, but it limits the liability of the owner of a vessel to his interest in the vessel itself and the pending freight. For, sir, as I understand the proposition——

Mr. DUNN. It is to limit the liability?

Mr. BOYLE. Yes; to limit the liability of the owner of the vessel to the shipper, the person for whom he carries and to others having claims to the interest of the owner in the vessel and the pending freight. Now, vessels are sometimes owned by partnerships. If the shipper suffers a loss, even by negligence of the carrier's servants, if the shipper suffers loss by embezzlement of the carrier's servants, and in many other cases referred to in section 4289, the carrier is bound to the shipper only to the extent of his interest in the vessel.

Under the law as it stood prior to the act of 1851, and as it stands now, as affecting carriers by river, while the owner is liable to the shipper to the full extent of the loss, whatever may be the owner's interest in the vessel, this would limit it to the particular vessel itself. I can see no reason why carriers by water should be relieved from the liabilities which attach to carriers by land. If a shipper by rail suffers loss the railroad company, or the owner or carrier, whatever he may be, is personally liable to the full extent of the loss.

In some cases, Mr. Chairman, it will relieve the common carrier altogether. Suppose the vessel to have been mortgaged to its full value, what relief would the shipper or passenger have even for negligence or embezzlement of the agents of the owners of the vessel?

Mr. DUNN. They avoid it now. I will inform the gentleman that it is a common thing now for a rich partner in the ownership of a vessel to transfer the title to an irresponsible employé and take a mortgage upon it for a debt or assumed debt. That is the custom in inland navigation now. You protect these owners to the exact extent to which the law protects the navigators on the high seas.

Mr. BOYLE. As the law stands the rich carrier is liable beyond his interest in the vessel. He is personally liable.

Mr. DUNHAM. Not in case he uses due diligence.

Mr. BOYLE. As to a common carrier due diligence goes for nothing. Only the act of God or the act of the public enemy relieves a common carrier. The mortgaging of the interest of the rich partner in a vessel does not relieve him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOYLE. But you propose now to relieve him by act of Congress. Suppose a vessel to be owned by a rich and strong corporation and the shipper's goods are embezzled or destroyed by negligence of that corporation or its servants, what is the remedy under this proposed legislation for the shipper? He will have nothing beyond the value of the vessel.

Mr. NEGLEY. The value of the vessel and the pending freight?

Mr. BOYLE. Yes, and the pending freight; but the vessel may be mortgaged, and then he will have but the pending freight. But both vessel and pending freight may be altogether insufficient to make good his loss. You will have a powerful corporation, a strong corporation, which has undertaken to safely carry the goods and failed to do so, and yet it will be relieved altogether from liability by this provision.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania overlooks the fact that the liability of the corporation would be equal to the value of the vessel and the pending freight.

Mr. BOYLE. That is a new view of the question, and one which does not seem to be warranted by the terms of the bill. My understanding of the section if adopted is this, that it makes only the vessel liable; only the interests of the parties in it, and that it does not make the owner liable to the extent of the value of the vessel.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That would be in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and that is not the rule of liability which is contemplated by this bill.

Mr. BOYLE. That would not reach the owner personally——

Mr. DUNN. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that under this act you can reach the owner to the extent of the value of the vessel and the pending freight. There is no question of that.

Mr. BOYLE. What I have been endeavoring to maintain is that the owner's interest in the vessel is all that will be liable. I do not understand that the value of the vessel affords the measure of the owner's liability which may be collected off him personally, but that only his interest in the vessel can be seized.

Mr. DUNN. Let me state again: each owner is liable to the extent of his interest, and all of them in the aggregate to the full value of the vessel and the pending freight.

Mr. BOYLE. Very well. Now suppose that to be the fact——

Mr. DUNN. That is it exactly.

Mr. BOYLE. Well, suppose it is; the loss of the shipper may far exceed the value of the vessel, which may be comparatively worthless. You have then, I repeat, a vessel owned by a rich corporation which undertakes to carry goods, and they are destroyed, lost, or embezzled. Now what provision is there to cover the loss outside of the value of the vessel itself?

Mr. DUNN. The loss is usually covered by insurance. He would be protected by the insurance.

Mr. BOYLE. What I complain of is that the law you are enacting here for carriers by water is not the law that governs other classes of common carriers.

Mr. DUNN. You should have made that argument in 1851.

Mr. BOYLE. I was not here to make the argument at that time, but I make it at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a word in response to what my colleague from Pennsylvania has said. I do not think my colleague has any objection to including canal-boats, barges, or lighters, because the provisions of the limited-liability law apply to all vessels, whether on the lakes or rivers or engaged in any inland navigation. This would perfect the section by including all vessels, whether canal-boats, barges, or lighters. His objection appears to be to the limited-liability clause generally, and I do not suppose he makes that objection to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. BOYLE. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I can see no reason for discriminating between canal-boats or lighters and steamboats and other vessels employed in commerce.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not understand the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania reaches to the point of refusing to relieve inland navigation of these burdens which do not rest on our coastwise trade?

Mr. BOYLE. I would not discriminate against inland navigation. But I wish to say that if I had been here in 1851 I should have voted against relieving ocean vessels from these liabilities, and I will go no further in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 41, noes 35.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted. I think we had better have a full vote on this proposition.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman will not press that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 93.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 4, at the end of line 12:

"Provided, No master, officer, or seaman shall be made liable under section 4287 or other provision of law for any act or omission of any other master, officer, or seaman to a greater extent than the value and freight of such vessel, unless such first-mentioned master, officer, or seaman, being the owner in whole or part, directly and personally contributed to such act or omission."

Mr. HALL. I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, with the view of encouraging the construction and operation of vessels upon the Western rivers in my own region of the country. Heretofore, since 1852, the exemption by which owners of vessels were liable only to the extent of the value of the vessel and pending freight as common carriers has been limited to the ocean business, while the vessels employed upon the Western rivers have not been encouraged by this exaction, and capital has not been induced to invest in that direction.

The only exception in which the statute of 1852 or the present statute changes the liability of common carriers is in the single matter of destruction by fire. In that instance the burden of establishing the negligence is thrown upon the shipper. In all other cases there rests upon the common carrier an absolute liability for freight lost, destroyed, or damaged, with the exception that the liability is itself limited to the value of the vessel and the pending freight.

Now, out upon the Western rivers it so happens that nearly all owners are more or less engaged in navigating the vessels that they own; and under section 4287 of the Revised Statutes that class of owners who are engaged in navigating their own vessels are made liable for the whole extent of the loss, though it may exceed many times the value of the vessel and the pending freight. The amendment which I offer proposes to change that and to leave such owners under precisely the same obligation as those owners who remain at home and are not actively engaged in the navigation of the vessels. It puts all owners on an exact equality, with this addition, that if the navigating owner is himself guilty of any act or omission which contributes directly to the loss, he then is liable upon the same ground as all other common carriers—to the full extent of the injury sustained. If such owner fails to employ a competent crew or fails to discharge any of the duties that pertain to him as owner or master, he becomes absolutely liable for the whole extent of the loss. But this amendment proposes that such owner and master or officer or seaman shall not be made liable to the full extent for any act or omission of any other master or officer or seaman in which he did not participate and to which he did not contribute; of course, leaving him still liable to the extent of the value of the vessel and the pending freight.

I trust, sir, on behalf of this interest, which is a large and vast one, and which has heretofore been crippled by a variety of circumstances, that this amendment for its encouragement may prevail.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to have section 18 of the act passed in 1884 to relieve American shipping from certain burdens read, so that the present state of the law may appear. I especially invite the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] to that provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the individual liability of a ship-owner shall be limited to the proportion of any or all debts and liabilities that his individual share of the vessel bears to the whole, and the aggregate liabilities of all the owners of a vessel on account of the same shall not exceed the value of such vessels and freight pending: Provided, That this provision shall not affect the liability of any owner incurred previous to the passage of this act, nor prevent any claimant from joining all the owners in one action; nor shall the same apply to wages due to persons employed by said ship-owners.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask that the original section of the act of 1851 may be read as a part of the history of this legislation. It is section 4283 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4283. The liability of the owner of any vessel, for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction, by any person, of any property, goods, or merchandise, shipped or put on board of such vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, lost, damage, or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel, and her freight then pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the effect of this provision of the act of 1851 is either modified or entirely superseded by the eighteenth section of the act of 1884. And it is now proposed, after a controversy of at least fifteen years in duration, for this subject was before Congress many years ago—it is proposed to extend the principles embodied in both these sections more definitely in the last, that of the act of 1884, to vessels navigating inland rivers. Many years ago, while the language seemed to apply to foreign commerce alone, the Supreme Court decided that the same principles applied to vessels navigating the great lakes of the North. But now it is proposed to apply the same principles to vessels navigating the inland rivers, and the question is this, to which I invite the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL], whether or no you will promote the interests of those engaged in the navigation of the inland rivers by steamboats by relieving them from liability for losses sustained of life and property.

Take the instance where a railroad accident occurs. The railroad passes right along on the margin of a river. As to the one common carrier, the railroad, for the general safety of the people, you apply strictly the rules which apply to the common carrier for the benefit of all men; as to the other common carrier, right by its side, employing a different element for transportation and travel, there you release the carrier from these liabilities as to life and property, except to a very limited extent.

I trust gentlemen will consider whether or no you are in fact promoting the interest of the common carrier by water on these navigable streams by this exemption of liability. Are we not running the risk at least of enlarging travel and transportation by those channels where there is the security of a monetary liability when you exempt the other agencies from such liability?

That is a question I think well worthy of consideration. And yet, as I have said, I discuss this subject with hesitation, because I was not present when these provisions were considered. As far back as 1872 the subject was in the House, and was then very carefully considered. It has been occasionally before Congress ever since, and I think even before 1872, as far back as 1867, it was under consideration, and the question has always been whether it was a wise policy to extend these exemptions to vessels engaged in inland navigation, with reference to their own interests as well as with due regard to the public safety.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] proposes to limit the personal liability and responsibility of a master, officer, or seaman, on account of any embezzlement, injury, loss, or destruction of merchandise or of property put on board any vessel, or on account of any negligence, fraud, or other malversation of such master, officer, or seaman, respectively. This proposition, of course, touches another question, namely, whether an individual who has been personally negligent, or who has been guilty of fraud, being a master or officer of a vessel, should not be personally liable on account of such neglect or fraud. That is a new question, and certainly there is a great deal of doubt about the propriety of undertaking to extend the limited liability law to a man who has committed a fraud. As to the other question raised, the general question——

Mr. HALL. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will yield to me for a moment I will explain. I think I have not been able to make myself quite understood.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield to the gentleman. It may be that I have not understood him correctly.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, by section 4283 there is an exemption made on behalf of men who invest their capital in sea-going vessels, but who do not personally undertake to operate and manage them. Section 4287 expressly provides that when they do undertake to operate and manage their own vessels they shall be personally liable to the same extent as common carriers, regardless of the question whether such owners or masters are themselves personally guilty of fraud or neglect, or whether it is the act or omission of their subordinates. Now the point I make is, that if you extend this exemption at all it ought to be carried out so as to effectuate the principle involved. On the Western rivers there are men who invest their capital and also operate and manage their own vessels, nd while they should be held responsible, whether the act or omission is on their own part or on the part of their agents to the extent of the value of their vessels and the pending freight, their responsibility ought not to extend any further, and they should not be held responsible for the whole loss, which in any particular case may be ten times as much as the whole value of the vessel, unless such loss is caused by their personal individual act or omission.

Mr. DINGLEY. That raises a new question, and I have not had time to ascertain whether the provisions of law already enacted will not reach the case presented. I wish, however, at this time to respond to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] with reference to the propriety of extending these limited liability laws to vessels plying on our interior waters. I wish, first, to call attention to the fact that it is very easy, under existing laws, for any owner or part owner of a vessel on the interior waters to escape liability by having the owners incorporated under the State laws, most of which limit the liability of the individual to the proportion of the capital stock which he individually may own. But, secondly, where those laws do not exist, the tendency has been for the owners of steamers on our inland waters to put their property into the hands of men who are not responsible, in order to escape individual personal responsibility. There does, however, seem to be as much reason for extending this limited liability to vessels navigating the larger interior waters, such as the Mississippi and the Ohio Rivers, considering that the perils of navigation there are almost equal to those upon the great lakes, as there is for extending them to sea-going vessels. As was stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], originally our limited-liability laws were confined in their operation strictly to sea-going vessels, but by decisions of the courts many years ago the principle of those laws was extended to those vessels navigating the great lakes, on the ground that they encountered substantially the same perils as vessels navigating the ocean; and, carrying that reasoning still further, it has been thought by the committee that the same ground exists for limiting the liability of vessels navigating our internal waters, and that it would be good policy to do so, because it would preserve the ownership of the vessels in responsible hands, and discourage such evasions of the law as are now practiced.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to ask him if it is not his understanding that the act of 1851, in its terms, applied only to sea-going vessels, and was designed to place American vessels engaged in foreign commerce upon the same footing as the vessels of other nations? Had not that been the general policy of the commercial powers for some years prior to that time, and did not we follow them and enact the law of 1851 for the purpose of conforming to that policy and putting our ships in the same condition in that respect as the vessels of other nations?

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely. That was one of the reasons; but in addition to that, the reason was set forth that vessels on the high seas go beyond the control of the owner, so that he can not have the personal oversight which ordinarily can be exercised by the owner of property upon land; and, secondly, it was urged that vessels upon the high seas are subject to peculiar dangers of navigation. The courts, when by their decisions they extended the operation of the limited liability act to vessels upon the great lakes, relied solely upon the latter two principles—the fact that navigation upon the great lakes encounters substantially the same perils as navigation upon the sea——

Mr. HOLMAN. And because, as the term "ship" is constantly made use of in the act of 1851, the foreign trade not being specified, the Supreme Court very naturally came to the conclusion that the act applied to all navigation by ships, rather than to foreign commerce solely.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the committee sufficiently understands the question so far as concerns the extension of this provision to interior waters. I hope we may have a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HALL, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 4153 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the last sentence of the last paragraph and inserting instead the following: "In every vessel documented as a vessel of the United States the number denoting her net tonnage shall be deeply carved or otherwise permanently marked on her main beam, and shall be so continued; and if the number at any time cease to be continued, such vessel shall be subject to a fine of $30 on every arrival in a port of the United States if she have not her tonnage number legally carved or permanently marked."

SEC. 6. That from the close of section 4177 of said statutes the following words shall be stricken out, to wit: "Such vessel shall be no longer recognized as a vessel of the United States;" and in lieu thereof there shall be inserted the words following: "Such vessel shall be liable to a fine of $30 on every arrival in a port of the United States if she have not her proper official number legally carved or permanently marked."

SEC. 7. That section 4371 of said statutes is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following provisions shall be inserted: "Every vessel of 20 tons or upward, entitled to be documented as a vessel of the United States, other than registered vessels, found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled and licensed, and every vessel of less than 20 tons and not less than 5 tons burden found trading or carrying on the fishery as aforesaid without a license obtained as provided by this title, shall be liable to a fine of $30 at every port of arrival without such enrollment or license. But if the license shall have expired while the vessel was at sea, and there shall have been no opportunity to renew such license, then said fine of $30 shall not be incurred."

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to amend section 7 by striking out all down to the words "every vessel," in line 3, and also by adding at the end of the section the following: "And so much of section 4371 of the Revised Statutes as relates to vessels entitled to be documented as vessels of the United States is hereby repealed."

This amendment has been agreed to by the committee, after consultation with the Bureau of Navigation, as being preferable to the repeal of the section of the Revised Statutes referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That foreign vessels found transporting passengers between places or ports in the United States, when such passengers have been taken on board in the United States, shall be liable to a fine of $1 for every passenger landed.

SEC. 9. That the fines imposed by sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 of this act shall be subject to remission or mitigation by the Secretary of the Treasury when the offense was not willfully committed under such methods of ascertaining the facts as may seem to him advisable.

SEC. 10. That the provision of Schedule N of "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883, allowing a drawback on bituminous coal used for fuel on vessels propelled by steam, shall be construed to apply only to vessels of the United States, and to vessels of foreign countries granting similar privilege to vessels of the United States in their ports.

Mr. DINGLEY. In order to make clear what otherwise might be subject to some doubt, I move to amend section 10 by inserting in line 4, before the word "bituminous," the word "imported."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 14 of "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum imposed prior to July 1, 1884, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, or the Sandwich Islands, or Newfoundland; and a duty of 6 cents per ton, not to exceed 30 cents per ton per annum, is hereby imposed at each entry upon all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign ports: Provided, That the President of the United States shall suspend the collection of so much of the duty herein imposed, on vessels entered from any foreign port, as may be in excess of the tonnage and light-house dues, or other equivalent tax or taxes, imposed in said port on American vessels by the government of the foreign country in which such port is situated, and shall, upon the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter as often as it may become necessary by reason of changes in the laws of the foreign countries above mentioned, indicate by proclamation the ports to which such suspension shall apply, and the rate or rates of tonnage duty, if any, to be collected under such suspension: And provided further, That such proclamation shall exclude from the benefits of the suspension herein authorized the vessels of any foreign country in whose ports the fees or dues of any kind or nature imposed on vessels of the United States, or the import or export duties on their cargoes, are in excess of the fees, dues, or duties imposed on the vessels of the country in which such port is situated, or on the cargoes of such vessels; and sections 4223 and 4224, and so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this section, are hereby repealed."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, section 14, strike out lines 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17.

Line 20, page 7, after the words "foreign port," insert the words "of first departure."

Line 21, after the words "light-house dues," insert the words "estimated by tonnage burden."

Page 7, line 29, after the words "under such suspension," insert the following:

"And such proclamation shall operate to carry back the exemption to the date of the first exemption of vessels of the United States from tonnage tax and light-money in the ports of such foreign countries since passage of this act: And provided further, That any vessel arriving from a foreign port in a port of the United States in distress, or not engaged in trade, shall be exempt from such tonnage tax; and that all vessels which shall have paid for the current year the tonnage tax imposed by law at rates in force until the passage of this act shall not be liable to the tax herein levied until the expiration of the certificate of last payment of tonnage tax."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the section as it stands in the bill will be admitted by all to be a very cumbrous and complicated one. I must say that I myself prefer to see re-enacted in its stead the act of March 31, 1830. My first idea was to introduce an amendment to strike out this section and re-enact the law of 1830, which is plain, simple, and direct, and under which the business of the Government in this matter was administered for a great length of time. But on second thought I have concluded to offer the amendments as now presented. They are, I think, in the direction of perfecting this section.

As to the first amendment, I see that in the section as it is draughted there is a discrimination in duties between vessels from the northern waters and vessels from European waters. I am unable to ascertain why if a vessel from the Dominion of Canada enters a port of the United States she should pay a tonnage tax of 3 cents a ton, while a vessel coming from Liverpool is obliged to pay a tax of 6 cents per ton. Striking out the lines I have indicated will repeal the exemption and put all these vessels on the same footing.

This section, as will be seen, is an amendment of a section of the act of 1884. Some of the language in this section is already law, and some confusion has already arisen from the indefinite language embraced in line 20, on page 7 of this bill. I propose to remedy that confusion by the next amendment which I offer, inserting after the word "port," in line 20, page 7, the words "of first departure." Let us, while we are about it, make this section so plain that a wayfaring man, though he be a little below the average, need not err therein.

The next amendment is in line 21. It proposes to insert after the word "dues" the words "estimated by tonnage burden." That I understand is the rule by which the tax is estimated in European countries, and the amendment is simply in the line of securing uniformity. I do not think there can be any objection to it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman explain the difference between "tonnage" as recognized by the Department and "tonnage burden?"

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have but a few moments to spare, and I have considerable more matter to refer to. I will leave that question to the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the main proposition embraced in my amendments. It has reference to the remission of tonnage tax on vessels of countries that do not themselves levy a tonnage tax. As I have said, I much prefer the language of the act of 1830; but I suppose this bill has received the careful consideration of the Shipping Committee, and this Committee of the Whole will not be willing to amend it in any important particular.

The amendment which I propose is to remedy an injustice which has grown up under the operation of the act of 1884. Under the operation of that act certain vessels were admitted free of tonnage tax because the countries whence those vessels came admitted our vessels free of tonnage tax. When this remission shall occur, however, is dependent on the proclamation of the President, and it is a fact to-day, with reference to a number of countries which have thus remitted their tonnage tax, that no proclamation has yet been issued. That, perhaps, is the meaning of the clause in the message of the President where he speaks of this remission as being a geographical one. In other cases the proclamation was not issued until some time after the countervailing dues were taken off. Now, my amendment provides simply for doing justice where the proclamation has been delayed or where it ought to have been issued.

Another amendment is simply to put the United States of America in line with all other civilized countries of the world. It provides there shall be no tonnage tax collected on vessels seeking refuge in American harbors. We certainly should not treat vessels driven into our ports by stress of weather or the perils of sea with the hospitality of savages by exacting dues for the privilege of seeking shelter. We should make this matter so clear, and plain, and distinct, that there can be no question about it.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a telegram received but a few moments ago from the assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says sections 2891 and 2894 are silent on that question. Whether the latter section exempts from tonnage tax collectors disagree. In point of fact such tonnage tax has been levied in cases where vessels have been driven into American ports through stress of weather, or when disabled by perils of the sea.

It seems to me there should be no question about the adoption of this amendment, in order to make the law so clear and plain that every collector in the United States would understand exactly what his duties are in the premises.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, this explains all the amendments I have offered. As I have said, they are simply for the purpose of perfecting and making more just and equitable the provisions of the bill. I should much prefer, as I have already intimated, that the provision itself should be stricken out and we should substitute therefor the plain and clear provisions of the act of May 31, 1830.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to oppose the amendment. My friend from New Jersey has offered five substantial amendments. The first amendment proposes to impose the same tonnage tax upon vessels engaged in trade between the United States and Central America and Canada that is imposed on vessels engaged in trade with Europe. Tonnage tax is merely a substitute for the light-house dues of other nations; and I may say it is the universal practice of all nations to gauge such tonnage tax or light-house dues with some regard to the length of the voyage. For instance, England charges a vessel engaged in trade with France only 3 cents a ton as light-house dues, or what we call tonnage tax, while she charges a vessel engaged in trade with the United States from 12 to 15 cents a ton, because the voyage of a vessel from the United States is longer. In the course of a year, while the vessel trading to Europe will make fewer voyages than vessels trading with Canada, the rate of the tonnage tax or light-house dues, according to the length of the voyage, will bring about some sort of equality of charge. And clearly a distinction should be made, as is done in the act of 1884, making the tonnage tax depend upon the length of the vessel's voyage.

Secondly, it is proposed to amend by providing that the port of first departure shall be taken to determine the trade in which the vessel is engaged. Suppose a vessel sails from Liverpool in ballast, without any cargo, for Halifax, and there takes in a cargo and proceeds to New York. Under this amendment that vessel will be regarded as engaged in the trade between Liverpool and New York, which would not be just. And I may say in that connection, Mr. Chairman, that we have followed the principle, which has always existed in our laws in imposing a light-house or tonnage tax, of allowing the manifest itself, showing between what ports the vessel is trading, to determine what shall be the port from which it sails within the purview of this section.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me ask the gentleman whether in case this amendment is adopted it will not have the effect to lower the tonnage tax at least 3 cents per ton on American vessels plying to European countries?

Mr. DINGLEY. If it does, more than four-fifths would go to vessels of foreign countries and not to American vessels.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But would it not give it to vessels of any foreign nation which would grant like favor in return to our vessels?

Mr. DINGLEY. But the return would be only a small percentage of what we would grant.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not the purpose of this bill to revive the struggling interests of American commerce?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not exactly comprehend what is meant here by "tonnage burden," as the term is used in this amendment——

M. BUCHANAN. I am referring in this to the port of departure.

Mr. DINGLEY. But passing from that. "Estimated by tonnage burden" is the third substantial amendment. I do not know the distinction between tonnage burden and the ordinary tonnage of a vessel.

The tonnage of a vessel, that determined by the custom-house and marked upon the main beam of every vessel, is the only thing, it seems to me, to which the custom-house can refer to determine the official tonnage of the vessel.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a moment?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, in making use of this description of charges estimated by tonnage, to confine reciprocal surrender of charges to that description alone. But while there is no tonnage tax in England, they charge light-dues and other fees equivalent to but not estimated by tonnage burden at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that; but if the gentleman will examine the amendment he will see that there is a clear distinction.

Mr. DUNN. Our proposition is to compel them to surrender these charges by whatever means estimated or by whatever name called. If we adopt that amendment we must surrender our tonnage charge on English and other foreign vessels, while they keep on their light-dues and other charges by whatever different names called on our ships. We are holding to compel them to let go everything of that kind.

Mr. DINGLEY. The substantial point of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey is where he proposes to date back the effect of the proclamation of the President to the time the foreign nation abolished its dues in relation to our vessels. The difficulty of that, it seems to me, is that it opens the question of refunding dues in the case of several countries, and will open up an exceedingly difficult question to settle hereafter.

The tender that we make to foreign nations is that when they shall satisfy the President that they have abolished their dues as to American vessels he then shall issue his proclamation; and if any foreign country fails for some length of time to satisfy the President with reference to that, the fault is with the foreign country and not with the President of the United States; for the proclamation on his part issues as soon as he is satisfied that such charges have been abolished by any foreign country as to our vessels.

It seems to me if we undertake to date back the time when the proclamation shall take effect, we shall open a very serious question of refunding the tonnage dues that have been already collected, and there stands ready now more than one country—certainly three—to make a claim on the Congress of the United States to refund these dues in case that principle should be sustained here.

I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, the committee will be wise if in the consideration of this matter they will consent to what is proposed in the bill reported by the committee with reference to the time when the proclamation of the President shall go into effect; that is, by confining it to the date when it shall be actually issued by the President.

As to the last point suggested by my friend from New Jersey, I concur entirely in the view he has suggested, that a vessel which enters a port of the United States in distress and does not land its cargo to be disposed of ought not to pay a tonnage tax. Under such circumstances no tonnage tax should be imposed upon it, and I had supposed the law was explicit enough on that point without legislation. This, I may be permitted to say, is the first time that I have ever received any information as a matter of fact that a vessel entering a port of the United States in distress and not unlading and disposing of its cargo has been assessed tonnage dues. Section 2894 of the Revised Statutes, bearing on that point, seems to me to be clear enough. That provides for the case of a vessel that has been driven into an American port in distress and explicitly declares that no such tax shall be imposed. I quote from this section:

> And the vessel may proceed with the same to the place of her destination free from any other charge than for the storing and safe-keeping of the merchandise and fees to the officers of the customs as in other cases.

Now if that provision of the statute does not cover the case, if upon examination it shall be shown that it does not, why undoubtedly when the Senate shall examine this bill—because there is no time to go into the examination of it to-day—an amendment of that kind can be appended in the Senate. But I supposed, and I am inclined to the opinion yet, that it is sufficiently explicit as the law now stands. As to the other amendments of my friend from New Jersey, it seems to me that it would be wise for us to decline to adopt them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for a separate vote on each amendment which I have offered. The first is the amendment putting vessels arriving from whatever country they may happen to come on an equality.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment proposing to strike out of section 14 lines 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 was again read.

The first amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 29, page 7, after the words "foreign port," insert the words "of first departure."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 15, noes 62.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As it is evidently the purpose to pass the bill in the shape in which the committee have reported it, I will withdraw the other amendments, insisting only on the one with reference to vessels entering ports in distress. That I insist upon, because the law as it stands to-day is not construed to relieve them from that burden.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that that amendment be modified slightly by leaving out the last clause.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That any vessel arriving from a foreign port in a port of the United States in distress or not engaged in trade shall be exempt from such tonnage tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the twelfth and last section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 12. That the President be, and hereby is, directed to cause the governments of foreign countries which, at any of their ports, impose on American vessels a tonnage tax or light-house dues, or other equivalent tax or taxes, or any other fees, charges, or dues, to be informed of the provisions of the preceding section, and invited to co-operate with the Government of the United States in abolishing all light-house dues, tonnage taxes, or other equivalent tax or taxes on, and also all other fees for official services to, the vessels of the respective nations employed in the trade between the ports of such foreign country and the ports of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill as a new section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That section 11 of an act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and to encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes, approved June 26, 1884, shall not be construed to apply to vessels engaged in the whaling or fishing business.

Mr. DINGLEY. That amendment is entirely proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments.

Mr. HEWITT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment before making that motion?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEWITT. Yesterday, after the remarks of my colleague from the northern part of New York [Mr. PARKER], I hastily draughted an amendment to meet what I considered a real grievance. The amendment was adopted. But I am satisfied, on reflection, that it should receive more consideration than it can receive without delaying this bill. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted, and I shall then ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment referred to by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"And provided further, That only one consular certificate shall be required on any one tow of canal-boats or barges, when trading between any port of the United States and any port in Canada."

Mr. HEWITT. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted. I am satisfied it is too vague and could not be executed in practice.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEWITT. I now ask unanimous consent to make a motion to strike out that amendment.

There was no objection, and the motion to strike out the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments may be considered as a whole.

The SPEAKER. If no separate vote be demanded, the question will be taken upon the amendments in gross.

No separate vote was demanded.

The amendments were adopted; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the title of the bill may be amended by adding at the end the words "and for other purposes."

There was no objection, and the title was amended accordingly.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MIAMI INDIANS.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House, out of its order, a message from the President of the United States. There seems to be some urgency in the matter.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 3d instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill authorizing the use of certain funds belonging to the Miami Indians in Indian Territory, proceeds of sales of their lands, for the purpose of relieving their present pressing necessities.

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 4, 1886.

The message was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Friday and Saturday of the present week, immediately after the reading of the Journal on each day, be set apart for the consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, not to interfere with the night session for the consideration of pension bills, and that the previous question be ordered on Saturday, February 6, at 5 p. m., and the vote on the bill be taken on Tuesday, February 9, immediately after reading the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED, of Maine, and others objected.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MARKHAM, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ELY, from this day to February 11.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

It is signed by the Standard Chemical Company, Berne, Scrymser & Co., the Russell-Coe Fertilizer Company, the Singer Manufacturing Company, the Elizabethport Steam Cordage Company, and many others, and remonstrates against the passage of Senate bill 121 and House bills Nos. 1220 and 1601, which authorize the bridging of Staten Island Sound in the narrow parts thereof at Elizabethport, unless such bridge shall be constructed without piers in said water way and of a sufficient height to allow the free passage of such vessels as now use this great highway of commerce. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a memorial of pastors of Christian churches in the District of Columbia, respectfully petitioning Congress not to sanction a provision of the Senate bill No. 696, now pending, by which saloon-keepers and other proprietors of bar-rooms will not be required annually to secure the written consent of a majority of the residents keeping house and a majority of the owners of real estate on the side of a square where it is desired to locate a saloon and on the side of the square fronting the same. This memorial is signed by 41 of the clergymen of the city whose names I perceive are familiar as those of pastors of the leading churches of the various denominations. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I also present the petition of 42 of the clergymen of this city, addressed to Congress, praying for the enactment of a law requiring that all schools in the District of Columbia and in the several Territories, that the Military and Naval Academies and schools for Indians and all other schools in whole or in part supported by the National Government, give such instruction in physiology and hygiene as shall give special prominence to the nature of alcoholic drinks, narcotics, and poisons and their effect upon the human system. He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1069) for the relief of George E. W. Sharretts, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 182) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 29) for printing the astronomical and meteorological observations of the Naval Observatory, to report a substitute for the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute reported by the Committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution for printing the astronomical and meteorological observations of the Naval Observatory.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the annual volumes of the astronomical and meteorological observations of the Naval Observatory for 1883, 1884, and 1885 be printed, and that 1,800 additional copies of each report be printed; of which 300 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 700 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 800 copies for the use of the Navy Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. These have been omitted for some reason not known to the committee; that is to say, the resolution to print has not been passed for a few years. This continues the series, and we change the resolution from a joint to a concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed, and the question is on the adoption of the concurrent resolution reported by the Committee on Printing.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the Continental Fire Insurance Company and others be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INDIAN INSPECTOR HENRY WARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be "no concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. DAWES on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all papers which have been filed in the Interior Department, and of all papers which have been presented to any officer of that Department, touching the official and personal conduct of Henry Ward, Indian inspector, during his continuance in said office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PORTS OF KEY WEST AND TAMPA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order under the eighth rule, and the first case on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to call up Senate joint resolution No. 10, being Order of Business 82 on the Calendar. I will state that there will probably be no time lost in the consideration of this resolution. It is needed by the condition of things in the State of Florida at the port of Tampa, where a large manufacturing enterprise is being established. There is required an amendment of the statutes relative to the importation of dutiable goods, so that these parties may receive their raw material (tobacco) from Cuba in bulk at Tampa. The joint resolution has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce, and I presume that there will be no trouble at all in its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 10, which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read by its title the joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the provisions of the first and seventh sections of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and that the provisions of the seventh section of the same act be extended to Tampa, Fla.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be considered as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see what the act of 1880 is.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator that the bill simply provides that goods may be transported in bulk to the port of Tampa and the duties paid there after the examination provided by the statute. Tampa is not a port of entry but a port of delivery, and the only provision of the bill is that goods which have passed Key West, the port of entry, may be entered at Tampa without being opened, being there subject to such examination as it is provided shall be had in such case, and there discharged on the payment of duties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend the chairman of the committee why this additional act is confined to the first and seventh sections of the act of 1880? I notice that one of the sections between the first and seventh provides how these goods shall be transported, that is to say, they shall be transported in sealed cars, &c.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] made the report in this case, and he will explain it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon; I thought it was reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOLPH. I have not a copy of the joint resolution before me, but this is similar to several bills of the same character which we have passed. I think this simply places the port of Tampa, which is a port of delivery, among the list of ports mentioned in the seventh section of the act of 1880 as a port to which goods may be transported under the provisions of that act; and all the provisions of the act would apply to this port. I think if the Senator from Vermont will examine the act he will see that all its provisions apply to the port. The joint resolution simply enumerates Tampa as one of the ports to which goods may be transported under the provisions of that act.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the necessity for the passage of this bill arises from the fact that a line of steamships has been established between Havana and Tampa, touching also at Key West, in connection with a new line of railroad which terminates at Tampa Bay; and it is for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of freight from that line and over the railroad terminating there that the bill is proposed.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand the Senator from Vermont not to inquire as to the necessity of the resolution, but to make a suggestion that inasmuch as only certain sections were mentioned the other provisions of the act of 1880, found in other sections, would not apply to this port; and in answer to that I meant to say, and now say, that I understand all the provisions of the act would apply to the port of Tampa that apply to any other port mentioned in section 7 of the act. It was only thought necessary to say that the port of Tampa, for instance, should be entitled to the same privileges as are enjoyed by other ports mentioned in section 7.

Mr. MORRILL. The original act was prepared by and introduced from the Committee on Finance; but for the last two or three years the Committee on Commerce have seemed to take entire jurisdiction of this subject.

The great objection to an extension of these privileges is that it involves the Government in a very large additional expense, and at this port of Tampa I do not understand that they have officers who are competent or authorized to receive and deliver goods as they are received and entered at ports of entry on the payment of the duties required and appraisement made, not having all the paraphernalia of a regular custom-house. I do not understand that they have that at Tampa.

I really think that these bills ought to be considered by the Committee on Finance, as the act upon which they are grounded was one reported by that committee years ago after long and patient consideration, and it was very carefully limited at the time to ports where it would be a national convenience. If we are to extend this to every little port upon the coast or to all in the interior of the country we might about as well abandon the idea of collecting any revenue upon importations. I suppose the larger portion of the duties that are expected to be collected at Tampa will be on Cuban cigars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will allow the Chair to suggest that the question now is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution? That is not debatable, although the Chair has allowed the debate to proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason why I rose to debate it was that I understood the Chair to say that it was now in the Committee of the Whole, and if there were no amendments proposed it would be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair probably was a little in advance. The question of taking up the joint resolution has not yet been submitted. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to its consideration?

Mr. INGALLS. Is that the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it would be very much more in accordance with the appropriate conduct of the public business in the interval between the time when the regular morning business has been completed and 2 o'clock we should go on with the Calendar in its regular order; and I should be very glad if that course should be adopted. I shall have no objection to the resolution of the Senator from Florida being taken up after that time, and will assist him in having it taken up; but the object of the segregation of this period of time was to enable the consideration of cases on the Calendar in their regular order, and I will therefore object until the hour of 2 o'clock, at which time I shall be glad to assist the Senator in taking it up.

Mr. CALL. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas to allow me to say a word before he makes that objection and I think he will withdraw it.

There is a large factory being established, in which perhaps something like $200,000 has been invested by some enterprising New York people, at the port of Tampa, in Florida. They have bought a large amount of property, constructed a street railway out to their factory, and have brought some two or three hundred people from the country around there and from Cuba to engage in the business of manufacturing tobacco in the United States. I suppose there are not less than five hundred people, who are brought there or are about to be, dependent on this industry. There is a steamer now running, a very superior vessel, lately built by an enterprising company in this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that this motion is not debatable.

Mr. CALL. I only want to explain to the Senator from Kansas to show the necessity for immediate action. The steamer is now running and they are desirous of importing the tobacco which is to be mixed with American tobacco and manufactured here. Their whole business is suspended because of the cost and difficulty of having to discharge their goods at Key West instead of at Tampa. That is the whole thing. There is a large business now about to be commenced and to which this law is a serious obstruction. They simply ask that they may be placed in a like position with other places in this country under the statute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time? The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by adding at the end:

And all the other provisions of said act shall apply to both of said ports and to all goods and merchandise therein mentioned.

The joint resolution as it is framed, I am very much afraid, in point of strict law would take out from the conservative and securing provisions in the middle part of the act of 1880 about sealed cars, &c., these two ports, and I offer the amendment in order to make it sure that every one of the provisions for security shall apply to these ports as well as all others.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CALL. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury may be allowed to appear in the RECORD.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it be inserted.

Mr. DOLPH. It may be inserted without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the letter will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt from your committee of a communication, dated the 23d ultimo, in which was inclosed, for an expression of my views thereon, joint resolution (S. R. 10), "to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.," and in reply to say that I see no objection to the passage of said resolution.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. S. J. R. McMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce United States Senate.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLISON subsequently said: I move a reconsideration of the vote on Senate joint resolution No. 10, which has just passed. I desire to examine into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PLUMB. On the 21st day of December I introduced Senate joint resolution 18. It had been introduced by me at two previous Congresses and sent to the Committee on Railroads, by which it was reported favorably and passed by the Senate. By some mistake this resolution was referred this time to the Committee on Claims. I now ask consent that that reference may be changed, and the resolution referred to the Committee on Railroads as before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that the reference of the joint resolution (S. R. 18) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, be changed from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Railroads. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. DAWES. Two or three days since I introduced a bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, which was referred through inadvertence to the Committee on Claims. I ask unanimous consent that that reference be changed to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks consent to change the reference of the bill named by him from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Patents. That order will be made, no objection being interposed.

JOSEPH F. WILSON.

Mr. LOGAN. In the case of the bill (S. 922) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson, reported on Wednesday last adversely by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which that bill was indefinitely postponed, so that it may be placed on the Calendar. I will state to the Senator from Oregon that this is not with a view of pressing the bill, but that it may have consideration at some time hereafter either in this or some future Congress; but there being an adverse report and the bill indefinitely postponed, it would not be very easy to get it on the Calendar again. I should like the Senator to allow it to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. I think it is usual, when there is objection at the time or a request is made afterward, to place on the Calendar a bill reported adversely.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not in at the time or I would have made the request then.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the bill named by him, reported adversely, be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report. That order will be made if there be no objection.

SITE OF FORT BRADY.

Mr. CONGER. I ask this morning unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 103 out of its order. It is the bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon. The report of the War Department and the report of this committee, as well as the committee of the last Congress, are all unanimous in favor of the passage of the bill, and it was passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress. It is very important that if this change is to be made it should be made at once. The bill should go to the House and be passed, so that the work of the change may commence early in the spring, as I am informed by the War Department. I think there will be no objection to the passage of the bill, for it has already been thoroughly considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 753.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] reported this bill. There is an amendment reported.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the title to the lands authorized to be purchased under the second section of this act shall be approved by the Attorney-General.

Mr. MANDERSON. This bill embodies the recommendation made by the Secretary of War, based upon a letter from General Sheridan advising this action. Fort Brady, as it is now situated, is entirely inadequate for the purposes of the defense of the important canal there. The letter of the Lieutenant-General shows that if the present site be sold it probably will bring nearly the amount of money appropriated by this bill for a new site. The amount of the appropriation for the new fort is $120,000, and the Lieutenant-General says he thinks the present site would sell for about $100,000. The matter seems to be of great importance, and my understanding from the Senator from Michigan is that it is important that no time should elapse before this change is made. The bill has heretofore passed the Senate and has received a favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs of the other House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that a comma should be stricken out at the top of the third page in the third line, after the word "to." If there be no objection that amendment will be made.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not see by looking at the bill that the reservations which the Lieutenant-General recommends should be retained by the United States are provided for in the bill. This letter, which bears date April 21, 1884, contains this paragraph:

> In disposing of the old military reservation, however, I would urgently recommend the retention of the Government dock and warehouse—

About which there does not appear to be anything said in the bill—> together with the plat of ground in connection lying north of Water street extended—

That is provided for—> and west of Church street extended.

About which nothing is said, and the communication of the Lieutenant-General concludes:

> I can see no good reason for the transfer of the water front of claim No. 97 to the owner of that claim. They now have all that was confirmed to them. The water front could only be of service by being sold because of the price it would bring, and if the owners of the claim have any equity in the matter it would be better for the Government to retain the reservation and pay the owners of the claim a reasonable sum of money in lieu of it; but I do not recommend this course until the claim is fairly established. In short, I recommend that none of that portion of the former military reservation recently transferred to the canal reservation be sold.

This is a matter with which of course I am entirely unfamiliar; but inasmuch as the propriety of the bill is based upon this recommendation of the Lieutenant-General of the Army, it appears to me that the reservation he recommends should be clearly established in the bill before we are asked to enact it.

Mr. CONGER. The part referred to by the Senator lying north of Water street extended——

Mr. INGALLS. That appears in the bill—

Mr. CONGER. Incloses that part referred to as a claim for a portion of reservation 97, incloses the water front in front of claim 97, which was by act of Congress given to the canal company for its purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. But the language of the Lieutenant-General is:

> North of Water street extended and west of Church street extended.

Mr. CONGER. Church street is a proposed intersecting street through the reservation. The whole of the reservation, including all the part that is in dispute lying north of Water street extended, has heretofore been given to the canal for docking purposes. The part referred to in the letters of General Sheridan and of General Poe as that which should still be reserved and not sold is amply covered by the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the water front of claim 97 reserved in this bill?

Mr. CONGER. That has been set apart by act of Congress, and is reserved in this bill as part of that land given for the canal, in reference to the water front there.

Mr. INGALLS. Will not the Senator point out to me the language in the bill that includes the water front of claim 97?

Mr. CONGER. This provides for the sale of the whole reservation "except that portion lying north of Water street extended." All in front of 97 is a part of the reservation lying north of Water street extended.

Mr. INGALLS. What about "west of Church street extended?"

Mr. CONGER. Church street is a street running north and south, and that would if extended to the river (and it does extend to the river perhaps as a street for water purposes), that leaves a part of this water front open on it.

Mr. INGALLS. Then would not the recommendations of the Lieutenant-General be effectuated by inserting after the word "extended," in line 6 of section 1, the words "and west of Church street extended?"

Mr. CONGER. It is not desirable to have in this platting Church street extended through the canal docks to the river, but if it were extended that would be an addition to the portion lying west of it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Lieutenant-General thinks it would be desirable.

Mr. CONGER. I do not find it.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will look at the bottom of page 2 of report No. 67, the last paragraph on that page, he will find what I have read. The Lieutenant-General recommends "the retention of the Government dock and warehouse, together with the plat of ground in connection, lying north of Water street extended and west of Church street extended." That must have some significance; and if we are to pass this bill on the recommendation of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, his views ought to control.

Mr. CONGER. The part he refers to is north of Water street extended.

Mr. INGALLS. How about "west of Church street extended?"

Mr. CONGER. All that, including the Government dock, now is reserved for dock purposes by a former act of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. Will not the Senator refer us to that?

Mr. CONGER. I did not anticipate any such question, and I have not the law before me.

Mr. INGALLS. I should judge from the appearance of this bill that it not only included what General Sheridan wanted, but what somebody else apparently might want, for I observe in section 3 that there is a further provision—

That in platting these grounds the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may reserve all that part of the reservation lying south of Portage street, to be set apart and kept by the municipal authorities of Sault Sainte Marie as a public park for its citizens and the people of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. That is a little piece of ground which is used as a parade ground and has a good lookout on the falls of Sainte Marie.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not see anything about that in the letter of the Lieutenant-General.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the Senator does not know anything about the location.

Mr. INGALLS. No, that is what I am trying to find out. We are asked to pass this bill on the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General, and I should like to know whether that is the ground of passing it, or whether something else is the ground. I supposed being public property I should have a right to make an interrogation on that subject as one citizen of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator is entirely at liberty to exercise that right.

Mr. INGALLS. I will move to insert after the word "extended," in line 6, section 1, according to the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General, the words "and west of Church street extended."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that. It is already provided for in the law, but if it makes it any surer I am willing to satisfy the Senator.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMS, ETC., FOR THE MILITIA.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask to take up Order of Business 59, which was laid over at the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. HARRISON. There was practically an agreement yesterday, or at least notice given yesterday that we would try to finish the Dakota bill to-day. I ask consent that the usual business under the eighth rule be laid aside and that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the Dakota bill.

Mr. SEWELL. Will not the Senator from Indiana allow us to finish this bill which was practically almost completed a few days ago, but laid over at the request of the Senator from Oregon? It will probably not take a minute.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New Jersey has a preferred place for his bill, so that he can not lose an opportunity for a very early consideration of it. It is the first business under the eighth rule. As others are asking to take up special matters here, I wish he would find it consistent with his pleasure to yield.

Mr. SEWELL. I shall decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New Jersey is not debatable. He moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill stated by him, being Senate bill 222, Order of Business 59.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 222) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to correct the phraseology of the bill in one or two places. In section 1, line 9, after the word "arms," I move to strike out the word "and" and insert a comma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made unless there be objection.

Mr. SEWELL. In section 3, line 1, after the word "arms," I move to strike out the word "and" and insert a comma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made unless there be objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I tried to secure recognition before the question was put on the passage of the bill and I suppose I may make a suggestion now inasmuch as the bill, was laid over, when under consideration before, at my request. I have thought it proper to state that I had in my mind at the time a joint resolution of 1876 which authorized the issue to border States of a thousand stand of arms by the Secretary of War, provided they were to be issued from arms which were out of use, no longer issued to regular troops, and also an act passed in 1878, providing for an additional issue of a thousand stand of arms to each of such States. I find on examination that this bill would not, as I feared it might, repeal those acts, and therefore I have no objection to the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the bill which has just been received from the other House may be referred to the Committee on Commerce, so that we may have it before us for consideration to-morrow morning.

The bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the Dakota bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] has drawn into this debate so many side issues and has answered so few of the propositions which I had the honor to submit to the Senate when I first addressed it on this subject, that I do not feel inclined to follow him in the digressions which he has made. He has adopted the common refuge of all persons who have a bad case supported by bad logic. He would have the Senate and the country believe that the opposition to Dakota has been confined to this side of the Chamber and solely to Democrats. Why, sir, that Senator has the most convenient or the most treacherous memory that I have ever known mortal man to have—convenient to suppress the facts of the case or treacherous in having forgotten them. He asserted yesterday that he had made proposition after proposition to this side of the Chamber and it had been met by amendment after amendment, suggestion after suggestion, made simply in the interest of delay and opposition; and in that he was supplemented by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] the day before. Sir, the Senator could not have forgotten that the original opposition to this proposition to admit Dakota came from his side of the Chamber and from one of his political allies and friends and associates. I do not mention this with a view of bringing reproach upon the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] who interposed that opposition, for I think he was right, but to correct the Senator from Indiana and to ask him when he is presenting his views to the country to state the whole case and not suppress part of it.

I find that on March 21, 1882, in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] presented the memorial of N. T. Palmer and others, remonstrating against the admission of Dakota as a State.

I wish to say—

Said that honorable Senator—

I wish to say that the remonstrance discloses a remarkable condition of affairs in Dakota. In 1872 the county of Yankton, one of the large counties in that Territory, under an act of the Legislative Assembly, sought for by the people of that county, issued bonds to the amount of $200,000 to aid in the construction of the Dakota Southern Railroad. The bonds having been issued, they were put upon the market, accompanied by representations of the leading men in the Territory as to their being sound and good, and they were taken by people all over the United States, representing many different States. The road was built; the people of the Territory have got the benefit of it. It is the only road going into Yankton County, is running at this day, and everybody there is receiving the benefit of it.

After paying interest for a short time the county repudiated its obligations and declined to pay, and the bondholders were thrown into the courts.

He then goes on to explain what the petition represents. Mr. HALE says further, in reply to an inquiry from the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN]:

I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I have received letters from individuals whom I know to be of the first responsibility, some of whose names are upon this protest and others who are not. The memorial is signed by the First National Bank of Brunswick, Me.; A. H. Merryman, of Brunswick, Me.; the Pejepscot National Bank of Brunswick, Me.; J. F. Whitney, of Topsham, Me.; John S. Wallace, chaplain United States Navy, Annapolis, Md.; Benjamin F. Emerson, of Nashua, N. H.; the Municipal Trust Company (limited), of London, England, by S. W. Packard, its attorney; Hettie B. Darlington, of West Chester, Pa.; William P. Marshall, of West Chester, Pa.; Eben Newton, of Can-field, Ohio, attorney for Mrs. Eliza Jennings, holding $34,000 of the bonds; William C. Scranton, of Utica, N. Y., and so on.

I will read no further because I do not want to take up so much of the time of the Senate. The Senator further said:

I ask that the memorial be laid on the table, the bill for the admission of Dakota having been already reported from the Committee on Territories.

On March 27, 1882, upon the question coming up again of the admission of Dakota, the Senator from Maine said:

I stated at that time that I had only heard one side of that protest; it seemed to me a very important matter, and it did not touch simply the act of some one person or one municipal corporation or one county in the Territory of Dakota, but the representations made in that protest showed that the inhabitants of the whole Territory, through their Legislature, participated in the act that resulted in the repudiation of a fair and legal debt, and the protest that I submitted wound up by declaring that the evidence from all that was that the people of Dakota were not in a condition or frame of mind to form a State to be admitted.

And so on to the end of the chapter. The opposition came from the Senators upon the other side of this Chamber, and yet the entire burden of the remarks yesterday of the Senator from Indiana was that the opposition had been raised on this side.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit me to call his attention to a single subject?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator refers to the friends of the Senator from Indiana on this side of the Chamber. The name of the Senator from Maine was mentioned in connection with my own. I do not remember that any opposition came to that Territory from any other source than the Senator from Maine, and he did not find any sympathy upon this side of the Chamber at all.

Mr. BUTLER. That does not alter the proposition which I have just suggested.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator's reference would embrace me in the opposition to the admission of Dakota at that time, and my position was altogether the reverse of that.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I did not intimate any such thing.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator's language might be so construed.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply quoted from the debate that the Senator from Maine, in response to a question from the Senator from Minnesota, had said so and so. The Senator from Minnesota declared himself very decidedly in favor of the admission of Dakota at that time, even with the stain of repudiation upon it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall not reply to the Senator's remark now but subsequently.

Mr. BUTLER. So I submit that the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Illinois, in attempting to give this debate a partisan turn, in "shelling the woods," in the graphic and classic language of the Senator from Indiana, have frightened up one of their own political friends, and it turns out that the principal opposition to the admission of Dakota came from a Republican Senator, and that it was continued until the end of that Congress.

Now, sir, what next? In the next Congress a bill was introduced, reported favorably by the Committee on Territories, and passed by this body, and it is that bill which I have introduced as a substitute for the bill of the Senator from Indiana—I say the same bill in all its essential particulars, differing only, as I stated before, in this, that it proposes to admit the whole Territory instead of dividing it on the forty-sixth parallel of latitude. That bill passed the Senate. It went to the other House and there seems to have slept. So much for that.

The Senator from Illinois, if he will pardon me for saying so in his presence, I have always found faces his antagonists, strikes right out from the shoulder and never takes an unfair advantage; and I was therefore surprised when the honorable Senator, in discussing this bill, should feel called upon (in which he was followed by the Senator from Indiana the next day) to introduce into this debate observations about votes in one section of this country, and with the same convenience of memory did not have the candor and fairness to give the votes in other sections. They have lugged into this debate the States of South Carolina and Alabama. They have referred to the percentage of the votes in those States cast at the last Presidential election. For what purpose? For the purpose, I must assume, of giving a sectional turn to this debate, and arraying the prejudices, if any exist, against that section and against the State which I have the honor in part to represent. That State and the other have been under fire for a great many years. They have survived heavier artillery than that which is now turned upon them and will survive this. Whatever may be the fact as disclosed in the vote at the last election, let me say to those Senators that never until your political friends camped upon the fair bosom of that State were her State officials ever tainted with the blemish of corruption. She may have committed a good many errors, will commit a good many in the future, does now perhaps, but it can never be said of her in her past history that her public officials were compelled to fly from her borders to escape the State's prison until our friends on the other side saw fit to reconstruct her; and while the degrading and disgraceful and humiliating spoliation was going on, not one word of protest did I hear from the honorable Senators who now arraign her.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I am sure if the Senator will read carefully what I said he will not feel justified in passing so far away from the scene of trouble, perhaps, that he thinks we were in. In reference to the vote of South Carolina, my attention was attracted to it from the fact that the Senator himself, representing that State, was the leader in this debate. I contrasted the vote of Dakota with the vote of South Carolina inasmuch as the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Missouri complained that Dakota, in 1884, I believe it was, voted some 55,000 votes, and on the adoption of this constitution cast only 31,000 votes. I then called the attention of the Senator to his own State, and to the fact that Dakota, with a population of a quarter of a million, voted 31,000 votes, and that South Carolina, with a million inhabitants in round numbers, as he said, voted 91,000 votes, and I asked him if Dakota was required to explain that would there not be an explanation needed on the other side. That is what I said.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; and I shall proceed now to explain. I was proceeding to do so, and as a part of that explanation I desired to impress upon the Senator a historic fact that might have some bearing upon the explanation which is to follow. In pursuance of what I was just saying I will make another statement for the information of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana. Since that State was redeemed under the lead of my distinguished colleague her escutcheon has never been tarnished by official corruption by any of her State officers.

Now the Senator from Illinois asks me to explain how it is that out of a population of about a million there were but 91,000 votes cast. I will tell him. At the last election the political friends and allies of the Senator in that State were industriously neglected. They were not encouraged or instructed or even approached by the honorable Senator from Illinois. All the people of that State, I believe, white and colored, are content with the present State government; at least we have a right to assume that they are. We have a right to assume that, inasmuch as there was no opposition ticket to the governor and State officers and none of any consequence to the Legislature, there was no issue in the State except that made by the Presidential electors, and the Presidential electors were not men calculated to bring out the vote. That is the explanation why only 44 per cent. of the vote was polled.

Now that I have given the Senator from Illinois an explanation will he vouchsafe one to me? Will the Senator from Indiana vouchsafe one to me? Will the Senator from Illinois be kind enough to explain how in his own State there were but 62 per cent. of the voters who went to the polls according to the record? Where were the other 38 per cent.? One hundred and twenty-odd thousand voters in the State of Illinois do not appear to have gone to the polls. Notwithstanding the fact that the favorite son of Illinois was upon the ticket as the candidate of the Republican party for Vice-President, with the "Plumed Knight" from Maine at its head, with a full State ticket of the most popular men of that State on both sides, yet but 62 per cent. of the vote was polled. Will the Senator explain that?

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator desire an answer now?

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. LOGAN. The explanation is only bearing out the argument that the Senator from Indiana and myself have tried to make, and inasmuch as the Senator from South Carolina is producing that which we were trying to bring before the Senate in a much stronger light than I at least did, I do not think any explanation is necessary. The point was this: Both the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Missouri desired that an explanation should be made as to why the vote had fallen off in Dakota. I tried to explain it as best I could from the statement of the Senator from Missouri that the committee of the Democratic party had notified the Democrats not to vote, and therefore the vote was less. That was the explanation.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, then——

Mr. LOGAN. Wait, inasmuch as you asked me to explain. If the vote of South Carolina fell off 40 per cent. and the vote of Illinois fell off at the same time and so in other States, without any reason, as the Senator says except that there was nothing to induce them to come out, why should not the vote in Dakota fall off at the same time without an explanation being required?

Mr. BUTLER. I will come to that.

Mr. LOGAN. That was the point I made precisely.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall come to that after a while.

Mr. LOGAN. I said that there might not be as much reason for the vote falling off in Dakota, although it had fallen off, as in South Carolina; but if it had fallen off in a State at the Presidential election, why complain that it had fallen off in a Territory? That is the point.

Mr. BUTLER. I see the point, but the Senator has failed to explain it. I have explained, in response to his request that I should do so, why it was that the vote had fallen off in South Carolina. The Senator has failed to explain why the vote fell off in Illinois.

Now I will ask the Senator another question. I will ask the Senator why, in that old, reliable, solid Republican State of Vermont, under the brilliant leadership of the distinguished Senator from that State who sits nearest to me [Mr. EDMUNDS], who was wild with enthusiasm for the success of the Republican ticket, but 62 per cent. of the vote came out and his own town went Democratic for the first time in its history? In that State, a neighbor to the "Plumed Knight," canvassed from one end to the other under the leadership of the distinguished Senator, supplemented by the brilliant leadership of my friend from Illinois and my friend from Indiana and all the big guns of the Republican party, but 62 per cent. of the vote of Vermont was polled for that popular ticket. Perhaps that can be explained. Perhaps the Senator from Illinois can explain how it is that the stalwart little State of Rhode Island, equally wild with enthusiasm for the Republican party, polled but 42 per cent. of her vote for that popular ticket; or perhaps the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Illionis will vouchsafe an explanation as to how it is that in the State of Maine, the home of the "Plumed Knight," but 69 per cent. of the vote was cast for that popular ticket.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be through in a short while.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator unless he is perfectly willing.

Mr. BUTLER. I prefer that the Senator would wait until I get through.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps these things may be explained.

Mr. LOGAN. I was just going to do that.

Mr. BUTLER. I would be very glad after I get through to hear the explanation of the Senator from Illinois, and especially how it is that in Vermont the honorable Senator from that State, crowned with leadership in this body and in his own party, anxious for the success of the Republican ticket, could get but 62 per cent. of his vote out, his own town going Democratic for the first time in its history.

Mr. ALLISON. What town is that?

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is Burlington. That is my recollection. When these things are explained, perhaps there will be shown some relevance of the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana to the question of the admission of Dakota; but until that is shown I submit that the reference to the proportion of the vote in South Carolina and Alabama has nothing whatever to do with this debate.

It is perfectly amazing, and sometimes edifying and amusing, in our history in this body for those of us who have not and can not in the nature of things have Presidential aspirations to witness and watch the contests going on between some of our friends on either side. I remember it was said of one of the most distinguished soldiers of the war—I think I am not guilty of disloyalty in saying that—a man who was called the "Wizard of the Saddle," that he had but one rule in military strategy, and that was "to try and get thar fust with the most folks." He was, perhaps, and I say it not to his discredit, somewhat more familiar with the use of his sword than with the English language. The man "who gets thar fust with the most folks," who occupies the strategetic point of a battlefield, everything else being equal, will whip the fight; and the race between my friend from Illinois and my friend from Indiana to get to Dakota "fust with the most folks" has been edifying, instructive, and amusing, applying to political strategy the strategy which was applied in war. I have no doubt that Dakota will be a State within twelve months, and that electoral vote will be a very acceptable, luscious plum to fall into the lap of some ambitious statesman who has become infected with the Presidential fever. But there is my genial able friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who lives near the border. All he has to do is to cross over and shake the bush, and I now warn my two friends from Indiana and Illinois that he will bear watching. It is perfectly amazing when the Presidential bee begins to buzz around a man's head even in this cold inhospitable weather to see how gentlemen will concentrate all their efforts, unconsciously perhaps, toward that goal at which they are looking with so much eagerness and anxiety.

The Senator from Indiana thrashed over so much of the old straw which he had gone over before, and put up so many men of straw which he said my friend from Missouri had constructed, that I shall confine myself to one or two points. The first is upon the question of division. He cites instances where States have been admitted, and I think he says—if I am mistaken he will correct me—that the average size of all the States admitted into the Union, including Texas, is 66,000 square miles, and that Dakota has 150,000 square miles if admitted under the proposed enabling act. If the people of Dakota, when they come to act under this enabling law, as I trust they will do, come to the conclusion that Dakota would be better divided than as she is, and all the people of that Territory have had an opportunity of expressing their opinion, North as well as South Dakota, I say to the Senator from Indiana I will join him in helping the people of that Territory to accomplish it; but I shall never consent to one-half of that Territory, as I believe in defiance of the wishes of a majority even of that half and certainly in defiance of the wishes of the north half, cutting that Territory in two to suit themselves, and I shall never consent until, as I have stated, all the people have had an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon it.

Upon that point, notwithstanding the flings and slurs of the Senator from Indiana that the Senator from Missouri and I have relied upon irresponsible pamphleteers and newspapers, I read from a leading Republican paper of the Territory of Dakota upon that subject, the Pioneer, edited, and owned I presume, by Fred. J. Bowman, published at Scranton, Dak. In the issue of January 20, 1886, the editor has the following:

Our esteemed contemporary the New York Sun seems to be at a loss to account for the wide gap between the reported population and the voting population of South Dakota, and says:

"According to the last census of South Dakota, on June 1, 1885, as filed in the Interior Department August 29, 1885, by the governor of the Territory, the population was 263,455. The vote of the constitution now before Congress, at the election held November 3, 1885, is reported at 25,226 for adoption and 6,565 against adoption, or an aggregate of 31,791 voters to represent a population more than eight times as large. The census of 1880 shows that the males in this Territory outnumbered the females by 30,000 in round numbers, and the immigration since that time has doubtless kept up this disparity."

The Sun, as usual, is right in its surmises. There is a wide gap between the census and the vote, and none are more conscious of that fact or more discreetly silent regarding it than the band of hungry office-seekers now posing in Washington as political martyrs for Dakota's sake.

The Sun rightly conjectures that the managers of the division and admission used effort to augment the vote, but it seems to have entirely overlooked the potent cause of the lightness of the vote, which is due alone to the general apathy prevailing among the people—not the politicians—regarding the move for division and Statehood.

The ringleaders of the scheme, actuated by a selfish desire to obtain offices, and that only, knew the people were indifferent to the project, and so they ingeniously set their wits at work to devise ways and means to counteract that undeniable fact, and to force an expression at the polls that, nominally at least, would augment the vote, which would have been very small indeed if confined strictly to the issue as to whether or not the so-called constitution should be adopted, as was clearly demonstrated by the vote on a similar constitution two years ago. So they proceeded to raise a number of side issues calculated to excite minds of the people and get them interested in personal aims and ambitions, which would serve as a cover to the selfish aims of the schemers in hoodwinking the people of South Dakota, and of the entire nation as well, by bringing out all the strength possible for the scheme.

The most easily worked and best-played card among the side issues was the scheme to locate a temporary capital for the alleged State, and as was expected the cupidity and personal pride and ambition of a number of booming towns "caught on" to the scheme and made strenuous efforts to obtain the prize, which was the chief source of the vote as exhibited by the returns.

The prohibition question also was dragged to the front, and, to the dismay of the ringleaders, who did not know that the "old thing was loaded," it carried, and thus became part and parcel of the alleged constitution.

The minority representation clause was the card played for the avowed purpose of drawing out the Democratic vote, and in a measure it succeeded.

Last of all was the scheme to "elect" a full "State," Congressional and legislative ticket, and in some cases a county ticket, also, was in the field, all of whom were "elected." The so-called Legislature met afterward and "elected" two alleged United States Senators, and organized so as to be ready for the dispatch of business, provided Congress sees fit to breathe the breath of life into its form, that it may in reality become a State.

Thus it will be seen that, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the schemers, the ringleaders of whom all occupy positions in the so-called State government, less than 40 per cent. of the voters south of the forty-sixth parallel cast their vote either for or against the question, for the reason simply that they viewed the scheme as being visionary and unauthorized, and promulgated chiefly by a horde of office-seekers, who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by its success.

The people of several counties, notably among them being this county of Walworth, with upward of 1,000 voters, refused absolutely to vote upon the question, the members of both parties being unanimous in the opinion that the project was unworthy of countenance or support.

The opinion prevailing here is that Dakota should be admitted but not divided, as provided in Senator Butler's bill, because Dakota is and always will be strictly an agricultural commonwealth, and such being the case, it never can become so densely populated as the manufacturing States farther east, even though their area is infinitely less, and consequently one State government is all that is necessary and all that her tax-payers ought to support.

The plea for greater representation in the Senate is the mouthing of knaves or worse, and is indulged in only by those who hope to climb into that position through a forced and arbitrary division of our grand Territory, inasmuch as great States of the Union secure their benefits rather from a large, active, united, and aggressive complement of Congressmen than from the dignified rubbish that too frequently in these days of a moneyed aristocracy pose as "grave and reverend Senators" in the United States Senate.

The Pioneer is a Republican newspaper, but it is solidly and unalterably opposed to any division of Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from South Carolina please advise me whether that paper is published in North or South Dakota?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know. It is published at Scranton. I do not know what part of Dakota it is published in; I do not know where Scranton is, I am frank to say. It is, however, a Republican newspaper, and the article is certainly very well and cogently and clearly written; and, as my friend [Mr. MORGAN] suggests, it is all the stronger if it comes from North Dakota as a protest from a people who have never been consulted in this matter.

I was somewhat struck with a remark made by the Senator from Indiana that he liked to see combatants within the same arena, and he went on to animadvert somewhat severely upon my friend the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] because he had seen fit to criticise the conduct of one of the executive committee, not disrespectfully I submit, and introduced his reply at the desk of the Senate to be read in justification of Mr. Campbell, when right upon the heels of that statement of the Senator from Indiana he began to pay his respects to two gentlemen from Dakota who he knew could not reply to him upon this floor. I asked him the question if he desired to be understood that because one of those gentlemen, having been a member of a constitutional convention in 1883, now saw fit to oppose this movement he was not entitled to credit. The Senator from Indiana declined to answer that question directly, but I submit he did worse; he attempted to destroy the character of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Boynton by administering the poison of innuendo and insinuation. They could not get into the arena with the Senator, but I am authorized by those two gentlemen to say that if the Senator will come into their arena before the people of Dakota, where they are known, and where their home is, they will convince the honorable Senator that they are entitled to as much respect and credence as he is or any Senator upon this floor. It makes a great deal of difference whose ox is gored.

I understand Mr. Boynton to have been a soldier in the Federal Army, as gallant and faithful as any Senator upon this floor, who went into the ranks with his musket on his shoulder, while some others—who are always prating their performance, ringing the changes for all they are worth, and some people think a great deal more—were lolling in the luxury of a tent, this ex-Union soldier, with his musket on his shoulder, was marching in the ranks to the tune of his country. In justice to that gentleman I ask that the letter from him, which I send to the desk, be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chief Clerk will read the letter referred to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL HOTEL, Washington D. C., February 4, 1886.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, members of the regular Democratic organization in Dakota Territory and residents of the most populous and wealthy counties, although widely separated, situated in that portion of the Territory lying south of the forty-sixth parallel, desire to correct through you certain misrepresentations which have been made in the Senate during the recent debate on the bill for creating a State out of the southern portion of the Territory. It has been falsely charged and repeated in a telegram read in the Senate from Mr. James A. Ward, of Pierre, that the Democratic Territorial committee, in their action at Mitchell in opposition to this Statehood movement, did not represent the sentiments of the Democratic party in Dakota, and that a resolution favorable to the action of the committee was voted down at a public meeting of leading Democrats at Mitchell.

The undersigned were present at the public meeting referred to and took part in its proceedings. The officers of the Territorial committee called the meeting referred to at Mitchell for the purpose of determining what action should be taken by the recognized party organization upon the division and Statehood question at the then coming election on these questions. In order to get at the sentiment of prominent Democrats in different sections of the Territory the committee invited the leading men of the party to meet them on the day fixed for the meeting of the Territorial committee for a general conference.

The members of the committee met and exchanged views before the public conference was held, and decided to ask at the public conference for a full and free expression of the views of those outside of the committee, with a distinct understanding that the committee would not attempt to influence the expressions at the general conference, but would rather sit as jurors to hear the evidence on both sides of the questions which were under consideration.

At the public conference the chairman of the Territorial committee was called upon to preside, and a full and free expression of opinions was solicited by him and also by other members of the committee. The numerous speeches were all in the line of the subsequent action of the committee, with the exception of the remarks made by Mr. James A. Ward and one other gentleman, both of whom had been members of and taken an active part in the Sioux Falls convention which had formulated the division and Statehood movement now before the Senate. Neither of these gentlemen made any vigorous defense of the movement, but their remarks seemed more in the nature of an apology for having taken a part in it; and Mr. Ward in private conversation with members of the committee stated that, as a Democrat, he agreed with the general expressions in opposition to the movement, but that his interests in the city of Pierre, which was competing with Huron for the seat of government under the Statehood scheme, induced him to attend the Sioux Falls convention and stand by its action.

The expressions in opposition to the division and premature Statehood scheme seemed to be so strong that a gentleman, not a member of the Territorial committee, hastily drew and introduced a resolution instructing the committee to take decided action in opposition to the movement. As this resolution was not in accord with the express understanding of the committee at its meeting previous to the public conference, one of the undersigned, who for twelve consecutive years had been a member of the Democratic Territorial committee, stated the position of the committee to the conference, and both of the undersigned publicly expressed the desire that no action should be taken by the conference which would seem to control the committee's action on such an important question, whereupon the resolution was unanimously laid upon the table.

Mr. Ward subsequently, as a member of the Territorial committee, offered to sign an address recommending that the Democrats take no action at the election, provided that the committee would refrain from incorporating their reasons or their objections to the composition and action of the Sioux Falls convention, in which Mr. Ward had so recently, for local and personal reasons, taken an active part.

The telegram from Mr. Ward, and similar attempts to mislead Congress, and especially Democratic members, by letters and telegrams from certain Democrats who have been conspicuous in Republican gatherings favorable to the Statehood movement, impels the undersigned to assert, in the most positive manner, that the Democratic party, as a party, and a large proportion of the best elements of the Republican party in the Territory, are at the present time unalterably opposed to the Statehood movement now before Congress and to the successive steps which have been taken by those who have been instrumental in its manipulations from its inception to the present time.

The meager vote for delegates to the so-called constitutional convention, the fact that the constitution, presented to the people with all the allurements with which it was surrounded, did not receive the sanction of much more than one-third of the voters in the portion of the Territory proposed to be set off as a State, and that more than one-third of the voters in the whole Territory have been excluded from any voice relating to a division which turns them out from under the paternal roof and deprives them of the name and Territorial home solemnly decreed by Congress to every settler in the Territory, ought to convince the members of every branch of the National Government that the division and Statehood scheme now before Congress is a gross usurpation of power not conferred by the people of Dakota, and ought not to be sanctioned by the General Government.

That the rapid settlements and unprecedented developments in the counties on either side of the forty-sixth parallel have caused many of the former advocates of division on that line to change their views, and are now strongly advocating early admission as a whole, or if division is deemed inevitable, that the division should be made north and south, substantially on the Missouri, a natural boundary, can not be denied. Any attempt by the advocates of the present Statehood scheme to attack or misrepresent the motives of those who have for the past two years steadily but honestly opposed their revolutionary programme should have little weight with Senators or Representatives, many of whom are familiar with the increased means of communication between the north and south, and fully understand that all that portion of the Territory lying east of the Missouri River is homogeneous in character as well as in population, while the Territory west of this natural line, in which there are at least twenty-five thousand Indians, should be retained under Territorial control as long as any portion of the Territory is excluded from Statehood.

Respectfully,

A. BOYNTON,
Lincoln County, Dakota.
GEO. S. ENGLE,
Brown County, Dakota.

Hon. M. C. BUTLER,
United States Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. That is from Mr. Boynton, who, as I have stated, was a Union soldier, but he appears to have committed the unpardonable sin in the eye of the Senator from Indiana of being a Democrat; and being a Democrat, although a Union soldier, he is to be assaulted, is to be questioned, though I believe his character has never before been suspected or impeached. I may say the same of Mr. Johnson. Neither of these gentlemen has it been my pleasure to know until within the last six weeks or two months, but I am informed by gentlemen who are familiar with their character that they stand as fairly in their own communities where they are known as any gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. President, in the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate the other day I studiously avoided, as I thought, any expression that could possibly give a partisan turn to this discussion. I tried to confine myself to the law, and I must say that I have seen nothing in the speeches of either the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Illinois which has successfully combated one single proposition that I laid down. They practically admit that they can not do so, but say, "We can make faces at your States." I expect they will survive those grimaces. They do not answer the argument, but, as I said in the outset, resort to the refuge of all gentlemen who have a bad case sustained by worse logic.

The Senator from Indiana said yesterday that I paid no respect to the wishes of the people of Dakota. No, Mr. President, my first duty here is—and, if he will pardon me for saying so, his first duty—to pay respect to the Constitution and laws, and then respect to the wishes of the people under that Constitution and those laws. On the contrary, the Senator pays respect to a political clique in Dakota of his own party friends, and then attempts to cut out a Territory according to the pattern which they frame. I prefer to consult first the Constitution of this country and the laws made in pursuance of it, and as far as they permit me to go consult the wishes of the people of Dakota Territory and of every other Territory and State in this country. The Senator has chosen to reverse the order of things, and complains because I prefer to obey law rather than concede the correctness of his position. I have no feeling against Dakota or its people; certainly not because Union soldiers are citizens of that country, and the suggestion, if it has been made, is unworthy a Senator upon this floor.

I have the profoundest respect and regard for all honorable, brave soldiers, and day after day and week after week and month after month and year after year I have given evidence of my respect for the Federal soldier by voting him pensions, millions upon millions, when my own comrades neither expect nor receive one single dime, while they pay their share of the tax for pensioning Federal soldiers. I do not complain of this. They were the victors—I was of the vanquished; and they are entitled to the thanks and honors of this Government; but they have no right to be eternally flaunting their performances in the face of the country in order to excite prejudice against others not circumstanced as they are. I am glad that there is enough of the public domain to give them homes, and no Senator upon this floor will rejoice more in their happiness and prosperity than myself, and no one will go further than myself to contribute to their comfort and health and prosperity. But, sir, when I exercise my rights as an American Senator, under the Constitution and laws as I understand them, I am not to be driven from the discharge of my duty by intimations from any source that it is actuated by hostility to the Union soldiers.

The Senator from Indiana has, as I said, thrashed over and over again the old straw which he first brought under the thrasher in the opening speech that he made. He has cited opinions from the distinguished statesmen of the past as to the regularity and propriety and legality of some of the precedents which he presented in support of his bill. He laid especial stress upon the opinions of Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Benton, but he did not read all that they said in relation to the State of Michigan applying as the Senator said under similar circumstances to Dakota. I have shown that the circumstances were entirely different. What did Senator William Hendricks, of Indiana, in the debate on that question say?

Sir, I undertake to say that Michigan is not a State, neither de facto nor de jure, and that she never can be a State with her assumed boundaries. The President of the United States is bound to see that the laws of the Union are faithfully administered in and over the Territory of Michigan, until the people of that Territory shall have the permission of Congress to pass from a Territorial to a State government, and no one can doubt that he will faithfully perform that duty. * * * There is no case in existence to which the present condition and attitude of Michigan can be assimilated.—Congressional Globe, page 42, 43.

What did Mr. Buchanan say?

He never should, whilst he had the honor to occupy a seat upon that floor, give a vote which might tend to disturb the States of Indiana or Illinois in the peaceable possession of all the territory within their present boundaries. The constitutional rights of these States, as well as sound policy, equally condemned any course which could interfere with their chartered limits. He was as free to express this opinion as the Senator from Indiana himself.

John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, said in the Senate:

My opinion was and still is, that the movement of the people of Michigan in forming for themselves a State constitution, without waiting for the assent of Congress, was revolutionary, as it threw off the authority of the United States over the Territory, &c.

Mr. Prentiss, a Senator from Vermont, agreed with Mr. Calhoun, and said:

He viewed the movements of these two Territories, with regard to their admission into the Union, as decidedly revolutionary, forming their constitutions without the previous consent of Congress, and importunately knocking at its doors for admission.

Mr. Porter, a Senator from Louisiana, said:

Being opposed in principle to any State coming into the Union in the manner attempted by Michigan and Arkansas, and which he considered so revolutionary, he felt himself constrained to vote against the bill.

In the House, Mr. Hamer, of Ohio, said:

Ohio acknowledges no right in the Supreme Court to try such questions (of boundary); she will never submit to such a mode of determination. It is a legislative question and not a judicial one. Here is the place to determine it. Congress has only to relinquish the claim of the Federal Government to the country in dispute, and there is an end of all controversy.

Mr. Horace Everett, of Vermont, said:

In relation to the point in controversy with Ohio, such objections, in my opinion, formed on the evidence present, do exist; arising, first, from the public works of Ohio, to which the mouth of the Maumee River is necessary, as an essential to Ohio; and, secondly, from the danger to the peace of the country from the acerbity of the controversy. On these grounds, and on these alone, I am in favor of granting the disputed territory of the State of Ohio.

Senator John Davis, of Massachusetts, said:

I do not like the mode in which Michigan has conducted this business. She has assumed rights that all agree are not well founded, and the consequence is that she stands in an embarrassing posture. She claimed to be a State before she could be one. She has acted as such without authority. She has elected Senators when our Constitution provides that they shall be elected by the Legislature of the States, and by no other authority. She had no such Legislature. She has elected a Representative, when the Constitution of the United States allows none but the people of States to elect Representatives, and none to vote for such a person except those who are qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. If she claim rights under this Constitution, as she does when she claims to be represented here, then she must be not only a State, but one of the States of this Union, over which the Constitution spreads itself; but we all agree she is not, or we should not be making provisions by law for her admission. (Appendix to Congressional Globe, page 558.)

On a similar line Senator Richard H. Bayard, of Delaware, said:

By passing this bill the Senate would be sanctioning the most obnoxious principle, and would inflict a vital injury on the cause of freedom. He argued that, according to the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, which regulates the disposition of the territory northwest of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, Michigan had no right to form a constitution at all without the leave of Congress." (Appendix to Congressional Globe, 1836-'37, page 80.)

So Mr. Niles, of Connecticut, and Mr. Vinton, of Ohio. Mr. Thomas H. Benton said:

He held that the people of that Territory (Michigan) might meet as often as they pleased, might take up the map, and drawing a diagram representing any boundaries they pleased, adopt these boundaries in their constitution and send the whole to Congress, and all this would be an innocent operation. It would be innocent, because Congress might act on it or not act on it, as it thought proper; they might agree to the constitution or not agree to it, and the whole would be innocent, for it would be nothing more than a proposition for the acceptance of Congress.

Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania—

Thought it would have been better had a previous law been enacted by Congress, authorizing the formation of a constitution by the people of the Territory.

Again Mr. Buchanan said on January 5, 1837:

Did gentlemen intend to push their doctrine of State rights to such an extreme, and thus enable every Territory to rise up into a foreign state, and put Congress and the Union at defiance? If this doctrine be not revolutionary with a vengeance, he did not know what could be so called. No, sir; our Territories belong to us. They are integral parts of the nation. We authorize their people to erect themselves into States subject to our approbation; but until they actually enter the Union, they continue in a subordinate condition, and are subject to our control. (Appendix to Congressional Globe, 1836-'37, page 149.)

And, sir, I might multiply authority after authority on that line. Now I have only to say in reply to the admonition of the Senator from Indiana that this was a question confined not to the people of Dakota Territory alone, but it was being voiced from one end of this broad land to the other that there were 300,000 people deprived of their rights under the Constitution and the laws, and it would not be safe to continue on that line much longer. I have made no such proposition, Mr. President. I have introduced a bill which will enable those people to assert their rights under the Constitution and laws, and when they do in pursuance of these laws I repeat, for the second, the third, the fourth, and fifth time, that they shall have my assistance in getting into the Union; and let me admonish the Senator from Indiana that if he and those who sustain his measure will take the responsibility of defeating this enabling act it will return to plague them in the future, and instead of the blessings, they will in my judgment receive the imprecations, of the good people of that Territory and of this whole country.

The proposition which I submit, I repeat again, is fair to the people of the proposed State. It will enable them to come into this Union within twelve months from this day; it will give them an opportunity to express their wishes and desires and preferences upon the question of division or no division; and when they are presented again to the Senate, if the distinguished gentlemen who are now knocking at the door for admission as Senators should be their standard-bearers, it will give me the greatest pleasure to extend to them the right hand of fellowship upon this floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I would not take the floor now if the Senator from South Carolina had allowed me to answer his question at the time he put it; but inasmuch as it would have interrupted him and he desired to go on, I reserved my answer. One or two remarks fell from the Senator's lips in reference to the votes of the Territory compared with the votes of some of the States to which I wish to make reply.

It is true I did say that there was as much reason for the vote falling off at different elections in a Territory as there might be for the falling off of the vote in a State. I did not attack the State of the Senator as he intimates, but I thought I was paying him a very high compliment—but perhaps I was mistaken—when I said that he was one of the leaders of the State of South Carolina, and that his State had always been in the forefront in every thing vital to the Democratic party, and had always, for fifty years, led it, whether in the right or the wrong. He may have taken this otherwise than intended. I hope not, however. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator, and will now give him the privilege of answering, as to where he gets his figures in reference to the State of Illinois when he says that the vote there in 1884 fell off from the vote of 1880 over 100,000?

Mr. BUTLER. I did not make that statement.

Mr. LOGAN. May I ask what the statement was?

Mr. BUTLER. I made the statement that Illinois polled but 62 per cent. of the vote at the election of 1884. I said nothing about a falling off. If the Senator desires to know my authority, I will state that I got it from the American Almanac for 1885. The vote in 1884 was 123,998 less than the number of males twenty-one years of age and over in 1880.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, sir, let us see whether or not the Senator is correct. Almanacs sometimes in figuring up make mistakes, or the persons who make the calculations do. The vote in Illinois in 1864 was 348,226; in 1868, 359,446; in 1872, 429,940; in 1876, 554,066 (an increase, the Senator will find, at every election up to 1884 in about the same ratio); in 1880 the vote was 622,312, and in 1884 the vote was 672,669; an increase from 1880 to 1884 of 50,357. So the Senator will readily see the error into which he has fallen. The vote in my State has increased at every Presidential election up to the present.

I do not claim that there is any credit to be attached to it for that, as people are expected to vote when not restrained. Circumstances might arise, however, that might cause the vote of my State to be decreased probably at some future election on account of some great calamity or misfortune befalling the people. Up to this time, however, we have not suffered in this particular. The Senator's State has suffered in some way, as the falling off in her vote has been nearly equal to one-half of the whole number cast in 1880.

The statement made by me in reference to the vote cast in favor of the constitution in Dakota as compared with the vote cast in the Senator's State was not incorrect, and is not subject to the criticism made by the Senator, as the per cent. of decrease in the vote of his State was much greater than the per cent. of decrease in the last vote in Dakota.

Now inasmuch as the Senator called in question what I stated in this regard, I hope that he is satisfied that I was justified in my remark when I said that the vote had not fallen off in the Territory of Dakota in the same proportion that it had in the State the Senator represents.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course the Senator has a right to take as wide a range as he pleases in replying to what I said; but my inquiry was addressed to him specifically, and I asked for an explanation how he accounted for Illinois voting but 62.1 per cent. of its vote in 1884. That was the inquiry. I replied to that question which he propounded to me about South Carolina.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I have replied to the question of the Senator in reference to Illinois. He will find in the almanac from which he quotes this error—and perhaps that led him to make the statement he did in reference to Illinois—the total vote of 1876 in the almanac from which he perhaps obtained his information is figured up at 709,207; but if you add the figures together correctly giving the vote for the two candidates you will find the total vote to be 564,066. I do not know whether the Senator fell into his error in this way or not. This statement as now made by myself is correct, however.

I have replied then to the question so far as Illinois is concerned and shown that the vote, instead of falling off, has increased steadily at every election. What I said was, as I remarked a moment ago, that Dakota, having voted at one time about 55,000 in round numbers, and the vote on the adoption of the constitution for and against was about 31,000, the Senator criticised that vote in a way that caused the inference to be drawn that the falling off showed that this population was not of a stable character, the vote at one time being larger than at a later date, thereby drawing the conclusion that the population had decreased since the census had been taken. I made the comparison with his own State to show that in States where the population was fixed and not transitory the vote had fallen off in a greater proportion according to population than it had in this Territory.

I said, and I repeat, "that perhaps while the Senator was calling for an explanation in reference to the decrease in the vote in the Territory, his own State might require some explanation in reference to that particular view given by him. There was no offense in that remark. I would have compared it with Vermont or any other State just as soon; but inasmuch as the State of the Senator who was taking the lead in the opposition to the admission of Dakota had fallen off, I chose to make the comparison with his State, and I can see nothing improper or unfair in that. Now, inasmuch as that has been called in question, let me give the Senator some of the figures in regard to his State.

The population of South Carolina being 1,000,000, in 1880 at the Presidential election of that year South Carolina cast 170,956 votes. In 1884, with the same population and perhaps an increase, South Carolina cast 92,860 votes. If South Carolina is compared with Illinois between 1880 and 1884 the vote in Illinois increased 50,000, while in South Carolina the vote decreased 78,000. I said an explanation is due from the State of South Carolina as much and more than it is from the Territory of Dakota.

I am willing to leave that statement exactly where the figures place it, and if the explanation of the Senator is correct, that the electors were not of a character to induce the voters to come out, that explanation of course must be accepted for the purpose of this debate. The electors were not of a character to induce the voters to come out in a State that has such a eulogium passed upon it by the Senator as to its honesty, its integrity, and its ability! I ask the Senator why they nominated such electors in that State in the midst of that honest and patriotic people as described by himself?

Mr. BUTLER. The Republican electors I spoke of.

Mr. LOGAN. The Republican electors got but few votes. It was your own electors that failed to get the vote you cast four years before. You can not. Oh, no; that will not do.

But the Senator went further than this. He said that the Presidential bee was buzzing around in such a manner on this side of the Chamber that it had in some way or other, either by excitement or something else, caused the minds of individuals to bend in a certain unjustifiable direction. All I have to say to that kind of argument is that when a Senator is debating a great constitutional question and can find no answer to make to the argument of his antagonists except to throw out insinuations that their minds are warped in some way by their aspirations, that Senator fails in having accumulated sufficient arguments of a substantial character to answer those which have been made by those with whom he is contending.

But the Senator says the same thing does not affect his side of the Chamber, and he alluded to the Senator from Indiana and myself as being in a contest here as to which one should do the most for Dakota. Mr. President, whatever may be thought of myself by others, I am sure that I stand upon a higher plane than that on which the Senator desires to place me. I am not governed by such small things as I find governing some men who think themselves great; I act from loftier motives and more elevated sentiments than that, and the men who attribute those things to others are sometimes actuated by those sentiments not calculated to be of an elevating character themselves. The Senator said he could not be actuated by any such ambition as that. Why? Because, he said, he was out of the pale. How out of the pale? I do not see why he is. I do not say that he has any such desire or that it would influence him; I would not believe that about him, although his estimate of myself is on that low plane; but I say to him he is no more out of the pale than anybody else on his side of politics in this country. He is not to be discarded for that or any other position. There is nothing in the Constitution that would prevent his aspirations and certainly nothing in the Democratic party that would affect him in the slightest in that direction.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, I hope the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Allow me to remark that what I said on that subject was really more by way of badinage than anything else, and I am sorry to see the Senator taking it so seriously. I did not mean at all to belittle the honorable Senator, for I have the greatest respect for him. I think he is quite worthy to be a candidate for the Presidency or any other office.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not a candidate for any office.

Mr. BUTLER. I said that really more by way of badinage than anything else.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not so understand the Senator; but no matter; let it pass for the present.

Again, sir, before moving in the direction of the constitutional question, I can not understand why it is that the Senator from South Carolina and another, whose absence I deplore, drag in the question of "soldier" all the time. Who has done that? The Senator says I flaunt—I use his very word; while pointing over to this side of the Chamber, said, "Why do you flaunt their performances in our faces every day?" Flaunt their performances! He can correct it if he thinks the English is not good.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, I will allow the Senator to correct my English for me.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I do not desire to do it. I have enough to do to attend to my own. Who has done this offensive thing?

Mr. BUTLER. I must do the honorable Senator the justice to say that he has not.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator; I hope I shall not, for if there is anything I have a contempt for it is the speaking of a man's own exploits. The Senator, however, said, probably in the heat of debate—in his cooler moments he perhaps would not have said it—that a certain man—I do not remember the name—a soldier from Dakota——

Mr. BUTLER. Boynton.

Mr. LOGAN. That Mr. Boynton was a private soldier. Well, sir, if he was, he is entitled to just as much credit in proportion to the duty he performed as if he had commanded the whole Army. "But," said the Senator, "while he was bearing a musket gentlemen on that side of the Chamber were resting in their tents." I do not know to whom the Senator alluded by this remark.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I said some of them; I did not say the gentlemen on that side.

Mr. LOGAN. That was an unkind remark, and I think the Senator if he will reflect will see that it was. I will not say that "he was resting in his tent," yet I do not think he ever carried a musket.

Mr. BUTLER. Pretty low down.

Mr. LOGAN. Those little things that are thrown out occasionally for the purpose—and if not are certainly calculated to raise a prejudice between soldier and officer, between those who occupied what are called inferior positions and those who occupied what are called higher positions in the Union Army—that is not the character of speech that I think is well in the discussion of a great question of this kind.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I ought to say in behalf of Mr. Boynton that I was informed that he entered as a private but became an officer before the end of the war. He served four and a half years.

Mr. LOGAN. No disgrace to him that he was a private. The only thing I object to is the allusion.

But, sir, the Senator then said that we make faces at his State. Well, I have known little boys who would run to their mother and say, "Jimmie Johnson made a face at me," or "was making mouths at me," but I never knew a man to do it before. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I must confess I never saw it before myself.

Mr. LOGAN. Making faces at South Carolina! I have not heard of anybody making faces at South Carolina, nor have I heard of any one making faces at any other States. I tried to say the other day—perhaps I was not understood—that South Carolina had been in the lead for fifty years as far as the Democratic party was concerned, that all the ideas upon which the Democratic party fed germinated in that State. Now, sir, if the Senator believes the Democratic party is patriotic, devoted to the country, and is the great party that he claims it to be, I ask him if that is making faces at South Carolina? I said she had been in the lead, and I state to-day she is in the lead, that the honorable Senator from South Carolina, representing that people on this floor, is in the lead in opposition to the admission of the new State of Dakota with a quarter of a million of citizens good and true, as a sister State in this Union. Is that not true?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. I think the Senator has not stated my position fairly. I am not in opposition to the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union. I am opposed to this proceeding before the Senate, but not opposed to her admission. The Senator will allow me to be more explicit. I am opposed to her admission under the proceedings which the Senator from Indiana has presented to the Senate. If she came here under different circumstances I should be glad to vote for her admission.

Mr. LOGAN. I will not retract what I have said for this reason—and the Senator will understand that I mean it out of no disrespect to him or his argument—but as I said, the Senator is in the lead in opposition to the admission of the new State of Dakota. The new State of Dakota applies here to-day for admission, and he is the objector. I suppose he looks upon it now as it comes as though it was a ghost appearing in a questionable shape, so much so that the Senator desires it may be driven away until it is clothed in a different garb, and then if it becomes more beautiful to him he may admit it into his presence. Until it does so, he objects.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has expressed really my view with so much classic grace and beauty that I am almost tempted to accept his quotation from Shakespeare; but that is not exactly——

Mr. LOGAN. I did not attempt to make any particular quotation.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator referred to Banquo's ghost, and I believe Shakespeare is the authority for that.

Mr. LOGAN. It was a mere reference.

When the Senator spoke of the Senator from Indiana thrashing the old straw, the Senator in his wanderings after the Senator from Indiana reminded me of a man in dreamland, where he first imagines himself on a high mountain and ready to fall over some great precipice; next crossing an immense stream; then riding upon the boisterous billows of a mighty ocean; then almost falling into a fire; and then again some beautiful scenery rises before his eyes on which he gazes for a moment, then plunging into some vast abyss where darkness and gloom hang about him and all the terrible thoughts that man's imagination is capable of. The Senator traveled all around soldier, citizen, newspaper, pamphlet, over States, Territories, empires, Indians, sandy plains, deserts, and Presidential elections, and in fact everything except the main question, and if he approached that it was when I was absent.

Mr. President, what is the main question? It is, Shall a new State, formed and fashioned regularly in accordance with law, with a convention assembled by virtue of law, preparing a constitution and submitting it to the people, who voted for and adopted it, and sent their agents here as petitioners to the Congress of the United States, with a sufficient population, with a sufficient number of square miles, with sufficient wealth, industry, energy, education, and all the requirements necessary to make a State, be admitted as a State? That is the proposition. If he touched it, I did not hear him. If he met the question, I did not hear it.

The Constitution does not prescribe the mode; the Constitution only provides for the admission by Congress of new States into the Union if they come in proper form. What is the form? Two modes are pointed out. One is by an enabling act, which is passed by Congress, giving authority to the Territory to form a constitution and be admitted into the Union under certain conditions prescribed by Congress. The other is where the State has all the prerequisites, the population, the wealth, the industry, energy, civilization, good-will toward the Government, and a constitution republican in form. All these are present with the Territory of Dakota.

First, the objection is made, as I said day before yesterday, because the population is not distributed. Second, it is said you must cut north and south a Territory 350 miles wide and over 400 miles long, divide it and make two shoestrings out of it. To make that character of a State is the desire, I suppose, of some of the Senators who say they would admit it as a State if it came in proper form. The form that they desire is to cut it clear down between the eyes, half-and-half, and they will take one half and take the chances that the other half will never get in. That is a strange proposition, but that is one of the propositions.

These objections do not meet the argument in favor of the admission of this State, or Territory, as the Senators on the other side call it. I call it an inchoate State. The Constitution provides for the admission of new States, not Territories. In other words, it is the admission of a Territory which has organized itself in the form and clothed itself with all the necessary paraphernalia of a State; when all that is done, all then that is wanting to make it a State on a perfect equality with each and every other State is the assent of Congress to her sovereignty as such.

That is the request made for Dakota, and that request is denied by statesmen representing States on this floor which were admitted into the Union under more unfavorable circumstances than those under which this Territory comes here. I did say, and I hope I will be pardoned for repeating it, that the only objection which can possibly be made to the admission of Dakota into the Union is its political character. Other objections are made, it is true, but they are made so that men may have an excuse furnished as a slight justification for refusing her admission into the Union.

Senators may say what they please, Senators may higgle as they choose, and stick in the bark as much as they desire, but I tell you the people of this country have a keen sense of justice, and when you tell them that you refuse to admit Dakota because some little clique, as you say, was urging admission, the people will ask you, "Did she not have the requisite population?" You must say "yes." They will ask you, "Did she not have the requisite number of square miles in area?" "Yes." "Did not the people have the intelligence?" "Yes." "Did they not have the wealth?" "Yes." "Did they not have all the educational facilities that are necessary?" "Yes." "Then why did you not admit her?" You will answer, "Because she did not have an enabling act." Then they will reply to you, "Eleven States have been admitted on the very basis on which she asked admission, and they were not as well equipped as new States as she is to-day; and why, then, did you keep her out?" The people will ask you these questions; and you may argue with them, but you will not convince them with the flimsy objections that have been made, but the common sense of the people who do not go into technicalities will say, "Well, I can not see why this State should not be admitted into the Union." The common sense of mankind will say, "It is an injustice; it is a wrong;" and your people in the States where political excitement does not run so high as it does in others will say, "I can not see the reason for objecting to the admission of Dakota."

This will be the judgment and verdict of the American people, and the longer you keep this issue before them the more intense it will become in favor of justice being done these people. It is strange, I must say, when a quarter of a million people who have been citizens of former States, permitted to participate in the affairs of the government, who have collected themselves together in new homes in the far West where they have gone to blaze the road of civilization that your descendants may follow hereafter, where the church spires point heavenward and the school-house shows that enlightenment is abroad in that land, come and beg of you to give them the same rights conferred upon you, it is hard, Mr. President, yes, it is hard, that these people shall be denied these rights. The denial of rights to American citizens has been before in this land, but whenever discovered by the people those who have denied them have gone down, and the time will come when the people will respond in favor of justice to our Dakota fellow-citizens.

Mr. President, I have said much more than I intended when I rose, and in conclusion I only desire to say that at the door of this great Capitol of this nation stands a quarter of a million American citizens, good, loyal, and true, asking that justice may be meted out to them, that they may have a right to a place on the flag that represents this mighty Republic; that in that cluster of stars theirs may be fixed and be permitted to reflect its glory upon rising generations, and be counted as one in the galaxy of States united in one great and prosperous nation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in the part that I have taken in this debate I have not attempted to introduce any political consideration, or at least any consideration that relates to the opinions of political parties as they now exist in this country. I have tried to place it upon grounds which I think are entirely defensible. I started out with the proposition that if I should make my positions plain to the satisfaction of my own constituents and to my own satisfaction, I should have succeeded in all that I desired to do.

I think it is to be regretted that the debate on so important a question as this, one that ought to go upon very high grounds, should be mixed up with mere political considerations. I felt that the honorable Senator from Illinois who has just taken his seat did himself, rather than us, an injustice when he said that we might argue as we pleased or might state as we pleased, we might do anything we pleased, we might asseverate as we pleased, but that after all the opposition we had to the passage of the bill was based solely upon the fact that this was a prospective Republican State coming into the Union.

I confess that I do not know how to meet a statement of that kind. When I make a statement on this floor and defend it by argument and by facts to the satisfaction of those by whom I am surrounded and to the satisfaction of myself, I stand upon the argument and stand upon the facts and stand upon the result, and the Senator from Illinois has no right to say to me, "Your argument is strong, I can not answer it; your facts are true, I can not deny them; your conclusions are just, I can not refute them; but the motive that actuates you is not a correct motive; you are a Democrat, and you want to keep a Republican State out of the Union."

Suppose I should retort upon this honorable leader of the great Republican party and should say, "You want more States in the Union that are Republican the next time you are nominated for the Presidency than you had before, so that you can get elected, when you were not elected the last time." Suppose I should put it in that light; it might do perhaps great injustice to the Senator—not more, however, than the imputation he casts upon me and upon this side of the Chamber. Suppose I should say to him that there are nearly 500,000 people in Dakota, the great majority of whom are Republicans, and that he desires to cut up that great Republican Territory into two States for the purpose of maintaining a power in the Senate of the United States which perhaps he might hereafter lose and that very early; that might be unjust to the Senator from Illinois, but it would be a conclusion against him quite as natural as his conclusion against me, that I oppose the admission of part of Dakota as a State without the consent of the people of the whole of that State, and without their having been consulted about it, because it is Republican.

There is a way to determine this question, and only one way to do it, and that is by the votes of the men in the Senate who have a right to vote, of the men in the other House who have a right to vote, and the action of the President of the United States, who has the right to approve or the right to veto. We can not determine this controversy either in morality or in law otherwise than according to law. What I am trying to ascertain, and all that I am trying to ascertain, is whether Dakota is here. I have argued that Dakota is not here. Dakota as known in the law is not here. The people of Dakota as known in the law are not here. Five hundred thousand people are not here, represented by 25,000 voters, neither are 300,000 people here, represented by 25,000 voters. A mere fragment, a vulgar fraction, if you will allow the expression, of the people of Dakota are here represented by the men who seek to come into the Union.

Therefore I contend, and I contend rightly, that the people of that organization as known to the laws of the United States have never been here; and when they did first come and first attempt to come in they were met and repelled by Republicans, and not by Democrats. They were criticised for their public immoralities; they were accused of being repudiators of their own debts. It was said that the Legislature of Dakota, after a decision of the Supreme Court had been made, refused to pay the public debt, and that they would not have a State to come into the Union with any such brand upon it. That, I am very glad to know, has been removed, and Dakota has learned its duty, and has brought itself now into a position where that stigma placed upon it, not by Democrats, but by Republicans, has been removed.

I maintain that the people of Dakota are entitled to admission into the American Union. They have got the population, they have got the wealth, they have got the boundaries, they have got every element of civil power splendidly developed, and they are entitled to admission into the Union; and I think that it is an outrage and an insult to that great people for the Congress of the United States to become a participant in an act by which that Territory is to be divided without the consent of Congress, and a portion of those people, without consulting the rest, are to bring one-half of that Territory into the Union.

I do not believe that the people of North Dakota desire it, and so I have asserted. I do that upon evidence which convinces me beyond all question. I am sure that if this very day the vote could be left to the people of Dakota at large whether their Territory should be divided north and south or east and west, that vote would be against division and those people would come in as a unit.

I shall not go over the ground that I have debated on this subject, for I rose merely for the purpose of trying to correct some incorrect impressions which came from the speech of the Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the committee. That Senator yesterday found that it was entirely convenient to ignore the first section of his bill, because he had, unwittingly, I suppose, run upon a rock in trying to navigate these shoals. He found, as was attempted in the case of Michigan, that his bill was to bring a State government into the Union, with Senators and a Representative in the other House, a governor, a supreme court, and all the paraphernalia of a thoroughly organized State by an act of Congress. When I asked him the question the other day, being on the floor, if the other House should strike out the last clause of the first section of the bill, which reads as follows—

> And that the constitution and State government which the people of Dakota have formed for themselves be, and the same are hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed—whether then he would be willing to vote for his own bill, the honorable Senator said that if a reasonable proposition or any reasonable assurance would come from this side of the Chamber (he always puts it on this side of the Chamber) that we would be willing to do anything in reason to bring in Dakota, he would be found willing to modify his views so as to join hands with us and let this one-half of the State in. Is it not a reasonable proposition that we shall admit the whole State? The Senator says, no; he wants two States.

> Insatiate archer! could not one suffice?

After Dakota comes into the Union there is nothing easier than to have the State divided by consent of Dakota and the American Union, provided the States of the Union will vote for it.

The honorable Senator, however, said yesterday that he was proposing to do nothing in this bill but simply to bring Dakota as a State with her constitution into the Union, and he was startled and astounded that anybody should be disposed to vote against the bill, which was so entirely fair and clear upon that proposition; and yet he was willing that the last clause should go out of the first section. Let me ask what else is it but the legislating of Senators into this body and of a Representative into the other body, providing as follows:

> And that the constitution and State government which the people of Dakota have formed for themselves be, and the same are hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

Mr. HARRISON. Would it interrupt the Senator from Alabama if I should ask him a question.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all, I think.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator able to point to the case of a State coming in even under an enabling act where her Senators did not come here with her constitution?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course they would come with the constitution.

Mr. HARRISON. So when Congress accepted that constitution and accepted the State government, the Senators who had already been elected were admitted.

Mr. MORGAN. There is a very great difference between allowing Senators to come upon this floor, which can be done by a vote of this body after a State has been admitted into the Union, and voting all the officers of that State from governor down into office.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if the language used in the bill is not exactly the language that has been used in all such bills where a State came here with a constitution?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; not all, I think. If it had been used in every one before this time, the honorable Senator must see the point which was made this morning in the argument of the Senator from South Carolina that States may elect Senators and States may elect members of the House of Representatives, but before such an election can be ratified by the Congress of the United States it must appear that a State has done it. There is no power whatever in Congress to give any such ratification as is here proposed. No, sir; they thought that would slip through the drive without anybody seeing it, I suppose. This band of enlightened patriots of whom we have heard so much, who have got themselves in the shape of Senators and Representatives and governors and the like of that, expected that they would come in as a body, voted in by the Senate of the United States, when the Constitution stood here confronting us and saying that nobody but States can make Senators.

Let the Senator answer that argument, and after he has done, so if he can convince me or any other reasonable man about it, then he can say that I am opposed to the bill because it is a Republican State that is coming in. So far from answering it, or being able to do so, the Senator will have to clear up with this body, and with the country, and with the people of Dakota the fact which he announced on the floor the other day, that if the other House were to strike out that proposition he would still be willing to admit the State without this coterie of officers. That is the situation.

The honorable Senator has made various allusions to this side of the Chamber. He identifies us. Yet I know that on this side of the Chamber there is considerable disagreement about one proposition in this matter, to say the least, as to the question of preference between the bill of the Senator from South Carolina and the bill of the Senator from Missouri in regard to the preparation of the Territory for admission into the Union. The Senator from South Carolina proposes a measure here which brings the entire Territory in and leaves it to the whole body of citizenship within the boundaries defined by the act of Congress to say whether they want to come in or not. It gives the whole State ample power to perform the same functions that they are petitioning now to come in with by the consent of Congress. The Senator from Missouri proposes to divide that Territory by the line of the Missouri River until you approach a certain region of longitude and then run due north to the northern boundary of the Territory.

These propositions are not equally popular on this side of the Chamber. There are some Senators who side with the Senator from Missouri in his view of it, and there are others who side with the Senator from South Carolina. I take the ground with the Senator from South Carolina that while the act of Congress remains this is an entire commonwealth, with defined boundaries and a certain organized citizenship and a government that we recognize, and it is our duty to provide for the admission of that Territory into the Union, and if we want to create two Territories pass an act to do it and then let either of them come in.

The question whether we should pass an act running the line along the Missouri River is a very interesting one. The Senator from Missouri sustained his side of the case upon facts and arguments almost conclusive. The one great fact which he presented, which to my mind is stronger than any of the rest, is that the great Sioux reservation lies within the boundaries of Dakota just west of the Missouri River. It might not be a convenient thing for us to cut that Territory through on the line of the forty-sixth parallel, placing the great Sioux reservation in the western half of the State. While it is a Territory and while we have absolute power over those people, it is hard enough to keep the peace there and to prevent aggressions of Indians upon white people and of white people upon Indians. We have had trouble enough with them. Put it in the bosom of a State and your troubles are increased. The first thing you know you may have a question like that between Georgia and the Cherokees to be determined. If the Territory is to be divided, I would very much prefer the line of the Missouri River for that one great reason if for no other. But if we divide on that line the Territory out to the western border of Dakota will be a long time growing into Statehood. It is largely a grazing country, largely a mineral country, extensively covered with forests, and its agricultural area is quite small. The portion of it west of the Missouri River will be a long time forming into Statehood. I repeat an observation that I made the other day on this floor, that if I were a citizen of Dakota it would be the last vote I would ever give to reduce the borders of that great commonwealth. But I pass from that.

I supposed this was a subject which could be debated. I did not suppose that it was a subject which could only be wrangled over by politicians and in a political way. The honorable Senator from Indiana did not content himself with a political wrangle on this question. He had found occasion to assail the whole policy, not merely of the Democratic party but of the Southern States in regard to this business. He gave me to understand in regard to the votes in my own State that he would give me enough of it before I got through. I had enough of it then; I was full of that emptiness at that time; and so I retired to the cloakroom and went to sleep.

The Senator from Indiana was going to give me enough of it. Enough of what? Enough of the reproaches he thought he could cast on my State because his ticket down there last year did not draw out a very large vote. Let us compare these cases and see whether they are analogous. Here is a question of Statehood presented to the people of Southern Dakota. Here is a question of division upon the line of the forty-sixth parallel presented to the people of Southern Dakota. Here is something about which they are clamoring until they make the heavens blue with their complaints because we will not vote them in the moment they come to the threshold of the Senate. The Legislature passes a law, makes appropriations, provides an executive committee to conduct the elections for delegates and spends the $20,000 appropriated in maintaining the delegations when they get to Huron. It empowers that executive committee also to create a debt against the coming State for whatever expenses are not met by the $20,000. You shall not legislate, they say, except for the purpose of bringing this State into the Union, but you may legislate to bind the future State by the creation of a debt upon it to cover the expenses of bringing the State in. This imperium in imperio has the power of legislation given to it by the organic act and by the ordinance of that organic convention to tax the people of Dakota by a debt that they can create and that the Legislature is authorized and required to meet. They have met and they have elected Senators to this body; and I suppose that if the police or the constables in Dakota had gone to them for the purpose of breaking up the meeting as an unlawful assemblage their sergeant-at-arms would have taken them and lodged them in jail for standing in contumely and contempt of the sovereign power of the little junta that met there at Huron. Coming here with all legislative powers as far as they dare to go, they stop just at the line where their action would not become violently opposed to the laws of the United States.

In defense and vindication of this little squad in Southern Dakota the Senator finds it necessary to say that because the people of Southern Dakota would not vote for it, would not come out, and did not respect it enough to pay any attention to it, the people in Alabama did not respect the Presidential election sufficiently, he says, to come out at the last election. The Republican ticket in Alabama did not have that great supremacy of popularity in my State to make it necessary for our people to come out to beat it. We knew that we could beat it without any difficulty, because the Republicans themselves did not care anything about it.

How was it with this constitution and this division of the territory in Dakota, the most supreme question that was ever submitted to those people, if it was any question at all? It is complained here that the Democratic party through its committee caused the people not to go to the polls, and in that way the fact is to be accounted for that the constitution only got 25,000 votes. The power of the Democratic party in that Territory seems to be much greater than I supposed it was. Are they in the majority? Fifty-seven thousand votes were cast for the last Delegate in those same counties, if I have the figures right. Some say the vote was 54,000, and others say it was 57,000. Take it at 54,000; where were all the rest of the voters? Were they Democrats? If so, these Senators are violating the first principles of political morality, as they understand it, by bringing a State into the Union without the consent of the majority, they being Democrats, in South Dakota. How does that look?

Were all the men who staid away Democrats? The honorable Senators know that they did not have a majority of the voters of South Dakota in support of this proposition, to say nothing about a majority of the voters of all Dakota. There is perhaps a proper comparison of the fact, and it shows the value of the parallel the honorable Senators are trying to draw between the falling away of the vote in Alabama at the last Presidential election and the falling away of the vote in South Dakota. The people of Southern Dakota had no respect for the convention at Huron. They did not believe that it was anything else than a political exploit. They thought its result was a mere tentative measure, through which, perhaps, some men might flatter themselves that they would get in here as Senators and in the other House as Representatives and into the State offices, and get the control of power, as was said here, by a snap judgment. The people staid away from the polls; they would have nothing to do with the election. That this constitution is to-day destroyed by the severe contempt and silence of the people of Southern Dakota is the fact about it. It can not survive their contempt; it can not outlive their silent opposition.

The honorable Senator from Indiana said, speaking of the question of our discriminating between Dakota as presented here and other States that had been admitted into the Union heretofore:

> Why this discrimination? Will Senators from the Southwest and West tell me upon what ground they justify themselves? I have heard in the not distant past the suggestion coming from gentlemen from the Southwest and South that New England had too large a control in the Senate of the United States, that the smaller States of the original confederation had an overweening and controlling power here in the higher branch of Congress. Yet these gentlemen now insist that it shall be the policy of the West and Southwest to demand that Dakota shall have 150,000 square miles and only two representatives in the Senate of the United States.
> Is it not possible, Senators, that divisions may sometimes be drawn on other lines? Is it not possible that this discrimination against the great agricultural populations of the West may yet come home to plague you? Is it not possible that this disposition to magnify and conserve and increase the representation of the smaller States here may yet be in your way in the consideration of some of the great questions of finance and revenue? Is it to be true by your votes that these great agricultural regions of the West shall be diminished in their representation in the Senate? If so, let us have the record made.

I maintain for the Southern States that as long as they had any liberty of action they always voted for the admission of States into this Union whether they were Democratic or not Democratic. Whenever the conditions of law were reasonably complied with, and whenever they could do so without fostering and encouraging a spirit of rebellion against the laws, they always did so. Who brought that Territory into the Union out of which this State is going to be composed? Thomas Jefferson and the Democratic party, aided only by one prominent man in the North, and that was Alexander Hamilton. What was the attitude of the South in regard to the division of that country into Territories and afterward States? It was acquired for the purpose of being made into States; and no Southern man has ever objected to any Northern States coming into the Union except when the question of slavery became so intensified as that it was a struggle of life and death with us whether we should maintain the equilibrium of power in this body and in the other House; for whatever else may be said about the slavery question and the slavery issue, this is true of it, that it was to the people of the South a question of $3,000,000,000 of property; it was a question that related to every household in the land; it was a question whether there should be political and social equality between our servants and ourselves; it was a question that was surrounded and fortified in the very citadel of the Constitution, and what we did and what we said in admitting States and afterward in going out ourselves and fighting the battles of the confederacy was all done upon the honest conviction, which no man has ever yet denied, that the Constitution did protect our property, and we believed that that Constitution was violated. So much for that now; so much for all of the slavery question that has been drawn in here.

I could retort upon the honorable Senators by saying that perhaps two-thirds of the slaves who were brought into the American Union came through the New England States, and that while they sent their slavers out to catch the slaves in Africa they prayed for the blessings of Almighty God upon the captains of the slavers that they might have a successful voyage and return home in peace and quietude to enjoy the liberties of their country.

But we brought the Territory in, and we brought it in to make States of it. That was our purpose and has always been our purpose, and we have never flinched from it, unless is was at times when we said "we want another State to come in with a Northern State in order to maintain the balance of power, so that you shall not transgress the Constitution of the country and put us to cutting each other's throats."

I wish to call the honorable Senators' attention to the place where the opposition comes from about cutting up that Territory into States. The effort is made to charge it upon the Democratic party, to charge it upon the Democratic party of the South, to charge it upon that portion of the Democratic party who represent what were called the rebel States of this country. I want to show from the history of the country how far that was true.

Mr. HARRISON. If it will relieve the Senator from any trouble I will state that I took no such position. On the other hand, I said that in all the history of the past the Democratic party had been in favor of admitting States, and that they were turning back on their record when now the Senators on the other side opposed the admission of Dakota.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Indiana turns to this side of the Chamber as the men who are opposing the admission of this State and turns to New England as the country that has always been willing to have States formed.

Mr. HARRISON. There is not a hint of such a thing in anything I said. On the other hand, I said the Democratic party would be turning back on its whole record as to the admission of States in its opposition to Dakota.

Mr. MORGAN. Then why should the honorable Senator have appealed to sectional questions on this great issue? Why does he try to array New England against the South and the Southwest and the West upon this question? I am glad the honorable Senator disclaims, but I want the facts to go out with his speech, so that those who do not happen to hear his disclaimer may know how thoroughly he is defeated on the facts. I read from Von Holst's Constitutional History of the United States, which I believe is a good authority, at least upon historical questions:

> In the resolutions of the Hartford convention, of which more will be said below, it was declared necessary that there should be an amendment to the Constitution, limiting still further the right of Congress to admit new States into the Union. The grounds of the demand are as follows: "At the adoption of the Constitution a certain balance of power among the original parties was considered to exist, and there was at that time, and yet is, among those parties a strong affinity between their great and general interests. By the admission of these States that balance has been materially affected, and, unless the practice is modified, must ultimately be destroyed. The Southern States will first avail themselves of their new confederates to govern the East, and finally the Western States, multiplied in number and augmented in population, will control the interests of the whole. Thus, for the sake of present power, the Southern States will be common sufferers with the East in the loss of permanent advantages. None of the old States can find an interest in creating prematurely an overwhelming Western influence, which may hereafter discern, as it has heretofore, benefits to be derived to them by wars and commercial restrictions." (Dwight's History of the Hartford Convention, page 371.) At the same time a New England paper wrote: "The Western States beyond the mountains are not taken into view in this connection for any other purpose than to show that they do not, ought not, and never can belong to the Union. Let the Western States go off and take care of themselves." (Ingersoll's Second War between the United States of America and Great Britain, page 225.)
> Plumer, of New Hampshire, declared in the Senate: "Admit this Western world into the Union and you destroy at once the weight and importance of the Eastern States and compel them to establish a separate independent empire." And thus Griswold, of Connecticut, who was looked upon as the leader of the Federalists, said in the House, October 25, 1803: "The vast, unmanageable extent which the accession of Louisiana will give to the United States, the consequent dispersion of our population, and the distribution of the balance which it is so important to maintain between the Eastern and Western States, threatens, at no very distant day, the subversion of our Union."—Von Holst's Constitutional History of the United States, volume 1, page 187.

I wonder if the honorable Senator from Indiana had that in mind when he made that prophecy and that appeal combined to the South and the Southwest and the West. I discard, as I have always discarded, the action and the doctrines of that Hartford convention. They intended to get the whole power of this Government in their own hands; or rather, having got it, they intended to hold it at every peril. The Southern people have acted just on the reverse rule. They acquired the Louisiana territory for this country. It started on the Southern coast and it ran to Canada and to the far West. I shall never object to a State coming in from that Territory; I could not do so without reversing the traditions of the South and all of the policies and precedents established by the Democratic party of this country.

Now, sir, I trust that I have at least, vindicated the people of the South and Southwest in this one particular, and that no Senator will ever point his finger at me and say that the South has shown a disposition to prevent the coming in of new States from this Louisiana purchase until at least he has first answered the arguments of the New England people upon that question and has shown where the true opposition started to the formation of States in the West. I repeat on this floor that the first objection I ever heard made to Dakota in the Senate came from New England, not from the South or the West. We are acting in good faith about this matter and we do not intend to be cheated. We are willing for Dakota to come in, but we are not willing to assist in the division of that Territory at the bidding and behest of a few men who assume to themselves the right to control the public opinion of a half million of people though only 25,000 strong, a lot of politicians congregated together for the purpose of capturing a State, as they would lasso a wild steer on the prairies, and haul it into the Union by the horns.

Senators may reproach us if they choose, they may misunderstand our views and our sentiments if they choose, but they can neither frighten us nor seduce us to cast our votes for any such contemptible scheme as this is.

Mr. PLUMB addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. PAYNE. I rise to a matter of privilege.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. PAYNE. I present the credentials of Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, re-elected to this body. I ask that they be read and placed on file.

The credentials of JOHN SHERMAN, chosen by the Legislature of Ohio a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1887, were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the proceedings. The paper from the governor just read refers to accompanying proceedings of the Legislature. I ask that they be read, because some other credentials which have been sent here have been extremely defective. I hope they are not in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proceedings of the two houses of the Legislature will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proceedings of the Legislature accompanying the certificate of the governor of Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a good certificate in every respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for an order to reprint a bill which I am informed has been exhausted.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That 500 extra copies of the bill (S. 1276) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender quality," passed February 28, 1878, be printed for the use of the Senate.

SITE OF FORT BRADY.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon, was passed to-day. I now enter the motion; I will not call it up to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 753 was passed. The motion will be entered.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, at this hour of the day I could not excuse myself in protracting this debate, particularly as I have requested Senators to remain that we may vote on this bill to-day and dispose of it; but there are two or three personal references in the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to which I will give very brief attention.

That Senator is very felicitous and gracious and deferential to the views and opinions and character of others. He began his remarks by an assault upon me because I had not mentioned in connection with the Yankton County bond matter that a Senator or two on this side of the Chamber had opposed the admission of Dakota on that ground. Sir, the point I was undertaking to make in connection with my argument was that the Senators on that side of the Chamber made no progress in the consideration of this question at all; that when the matter of objection as to the Yankton County bonds was wholly removed they were found still in their same old position of obstinate resistance to the admission of Dakota. The Senator from Maine, representing some of his people, felt that Yankton County had been guilty of a breach of faith toward her creditors and that the Territory of Dakota had complicated herself in that act of repudiation; but the very moment that matter was set right, as it has been set right by the refunding of the debt dollar for dollar and a proper arrangement for the payment of those bonds, he surrendered his opposition and is now favoring the admission of Dakota. But has it made the slightest difference in the attitude of the Senator from Missouri? Has it in any degree more kindly disposed the Senator from South Carolina? Not a whit, Mr. President.

What argument may I draw from that? That so far as this objection was used by those Senators it was at the time a pretext and an excuse; that and nothing more. If their objection had been based upon the Yankton County bond matter, when that was cleared up they would have yielded their opposition; but, as I said yesterday, it only assumed another shape.

The Senator said I had been thrashing over old straw, and he complained of it. I do not wonder that the twice-thrashed straw cries out against the flail.

He said I had been going into by-paths in this discussion. I do not wonder that one who has been following the endless round of the bark-mill in the discussion thinks that the roadster who goes by on the road is lost.

Where is this discussion, I repeat again? The Senator from South Carolina by the hour argued that the vote upon this constitution in Dakota is not sufficient to stamp it with the popular approval. Does he mean that? Does it influence his judgment in the smallest degree? If it did he would propose that this constitution should be resubmitted to the people for a popular vote. But he makes no such proposition. He argues again that the people are opposed to division. Does he propose to submit that question to the people of Dakota in any form? Not at all. He proposes to settle it himself and to say that there shall be no division.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat that when Senators spend their time in arguing such propositions and then offer amendments that are not calculated to test the popular support of this constitution or to test the popular opinion in Dakota as to division, but assuming those questions themselves, the one dividing the Territory upon the Missouri River and the other denying the division altogether, they are not sincere when they put their opposition upon the ground that there is not a popular acquiescence in this movement. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] asks me if there have been any memorials remonstrating against the division. I alluded to that yesterday. Not a popular convention, not a meeting of agriculturists, not a religious association of any kind, no body of men met together in North or in South Dakota have ever protested against this division. On the other hand, before it could be a question of politics, before any man could know what the politics of the States to be formed out of that Territory could be, her people settled upon the idea of division, and by memorials from their Legislature to Congress, by legislative enactments which assumed it for eleven years, have poured in upon Congress one uninterrupted and uniform expression in favor of division.

That is the history of this matter, and yet Senators who assume to attack the motives and to impute purposes to us ask that their opposition may be treated as sincere when the propositions they make to amend the bill lie right across the very arguments they make.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina said that I had impugned the character of Mr. Boynton. It is not true, sir, and the RECORD with my remarks in it was upon the table of the Senator when he made that statement. The Senator interrupted me, and asked if I meant to make any imputation upon the personal character of Mr. Boynton. I told him then that what I said of Mr. Boynton was simply this, that he was here denouncing the proceedings of the Sioux Falls convention of 1885 as a revolutionary proceeding, and that by the record on the files of the Territorial committee he had two years ago himself been a member of a constitutional convention called in a manner less orderly, and had there been an advocate of going on to the complete organization of a State government. That is what I said about him, and the Senator from South Carolina had the means of informing himself and did not need to let it rest in recollection.

He imputed to me a disposition to attack any man, and especially a Union soldier, because he was a Democrat! Mr. President, I have never anywhere or at any time, here or on the hustings, had but one voice upon this subject, and that was, that the man who in the hour of his country's need had bravely gone to the rescue, had exposed himself to shot and shell and saber-stroke in defense of the flag, was entitled to choose his own politics, and, while I might object to his taste, I had no criticisms for him.

Sir, who introduced all these personalities? Where has this tide of abuse which has been heaped upon citizens of Dakota had its strength? Not on this side of the Chamber; but Senators on that side of the Chamber from the very beginning of this debate have felt warranted in calling the men who had been conspicuous in this movement for the formation of a new State conspirators, ambitious and scheming politicians; and that course of vituperation has run through the whole debate on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. What is the distinction between an ambitious politician and a statesman? Do all my friends on the other side of the Chamber fall into the list of statesmen? Have they no ambition? I appeal to Senators who have heard every word I have spoken in this debate from first to last whether I have not avoided, against strenuous temptation, the bringing into this debate of the private characters of men whose names have been drawn in here by the Senator from South Carolina, whose opposition to this bill has been so intense that I never regarded him as within the reach of reason or logic. It has seemed to me that nothing but Pasteur's new treatment would do in his case.

Mr. President, I alluded to the vote of South Carolina and to the vote of Alabama; and how sensitive the Senator is! As the Senator from Illinois has said, the whole object, the whole force of the reference to the votes of these States was that if South Carolina voted only 44 per cent. in 1884 of her voting population in 1880 it ought not to be a conclusive objection to this constitution in Dakota that nearly 58 or quite 58 per cent. of her people had voted on the question. The Senator is so sensitive to the honor of his State that he is blind to the argument or the purpose for which the facts were used, and forthwith he rushes to the American Almanac to see if in any other States, as well as in those to which I referred, the vote in a Presidential election has been a less per cent. of the total vote than was given for this constitution in Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. Where does the Senator get his information from?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I asked where the Senator got his information from? Did he not read from that same almanac?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir. I was not criticising the Senator's authority.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought you were.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish the Senator may always go to as reliable a book. I was only suggesting that the Senator's sensitiveness about what he thought to be a reflection upon South Carolina led him to bring in additional facts here to the Senate, and from the votes of other States to show us that the vote in Dakota was a very reasonable one after all. I do not undertake to account for this diminished vote in South Carolina. It must have been less than 40 per cent. of the voting population in 1884, for it was only 44 per cent. of that in 1880, four years before.

The Senator from South Carolina says that we did not encourage the Republicans down there to come out and vote; that they needed encouragement, and that the Senator from Illinois and other leaders of the Republican party failed to go down and encourage them. Well, Mr. President, they are a discouraged set, those Republicans in South Carolina. They have never had any encouragement since 1876, and the only efficient encouragement, according to their judgment, was the presence of some of the troops of the United States. We can not do that any more, and perhaps it never ought to have been done. But this is aside from the question altogether. The elections in South Carolina may be fair; everybody who wants to vote may have a chance to vote; all the talk of intimidation may be absolutely false; all the stories of bloodshed and violence and red-shirted cavalry may all be imagination; all the stories of tissue ballots may be vain and fraudulent. For the purposes of this argument I assume that they are; that there is nothing in them in the world; and yet I ask the Senator from South Carolina if in a Presidential election, if in the election of a Legislature that is to choose Senators for this body, 44 per cent. of the total vote in South Carolina is sufficiently expressive of the popular will there to choose these officers, may it not be that upon the mere question of voting on a constitution in Dakota 58 per cent. is enough?

Mr. President, whatever the Senator from Alabama may say, he and the Senator from South Carolina both know that a vote upon a constitution is not an exciting election. In my own State, in 1880, the people were called at a special election to vote for certain important amendments to the constitution of that State, and yet the vote was 140,000 short. Why was that? Simply because it is true that political contests between men, where political leaders are upon the stump, where candidates are soliciting popular suffrage, tend to bring out a larger vote than any mere abstract question upon the selection or rejection of a State constitution; and that is particularly true where the constitution itself does not present an issue, as in Kansas, between slavery and freedom.

The Senator from Alabama was also sensitive about the reference to his State. I selected those States because the Senators in whose States those votes were taken were the Senators on this floor who were urging this objection; not for any purpose of giving a sectional turn to this discussion, for, as I have said to the Senator from South Carolina, I do not care what the reason is, whether Republicans were discouraged because we did not go down there and help them and make speeches for them, or whatever explanation may be given of it. There is the fact that in his own State a very much smaller percentage of the population voted in a Presidential election than voted in Dakota for this constitution.

But, Mr. President, what is the use of discussing this with the Senator from South Carolina? If every adult male and female over the age of twenty-one years had voted for this constitution in South Dakota the Senator would not have favored it.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I will return the compliment of the Senator by saying that it is not true.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator could not have favored it unless he has abandoned the argument which he has made, because he says those people, even if they all concurred, had no right to divide the Territory; and if I understand him now to say that if there had been unanimity in that vote he would have conceded the right of the people to divide the Territory without the consent of those living north of that line, then I submit again he has abandoned one of the fundamental lines of his argument in this case; and I assumed therefore that he would not have consented if the vote had been unanimous, because he could not do so without involving himself in contradiction with the rest of his argument.

The Senator from Alabama says that in his State the Democrats did not come out because the Republicans were so weak that they knew they could beat them and a great many of them staid at home. May it not be possible that notwithstanding these people in Alabama staid at home the result of the election is to be accepted? Who claims that in Dakota the election there was not well advertised; that polling places were not established convenient to every voter so that every one might vote if he pleased? Who denies it? That being so, with a fair opportunity to vote, abundant advertisement of the election, shall we say that 58 per cent. of the population is too small an expression of the popular will on this subject?

But, Mr. President, I will not protract this debate; I will not even restate the propositions upon which I rely; I only say that meeting the Senator from Alabama, who criticised an expression in the first section of the bill, I will presently move to strike out the words "and State government" with a view of ascertaining whether this objection upon which he dwelt so long was a serious one in his mind or will influence in any way his vote upon the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to say one word. The Senator from Indiana says he thinks I ought to have Pasteur's treatment, which I believe is the inoculation of the virus of a mad dog. Does the Senator understand that I shall use the virus which comes from the Senator to inoculate me?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. He has been very bitter, but I have not yet been bitten—by him.

Mr. HARRISON. That is very good. I would suggest the rabbit.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech upon this bill, but I must before giving my vote on so important a measure state the grounds on which I shall vote. I do not wish to be regarded as being influenced in any vote which I shall give by many of the arguments and considerations which have been urged on this subject. I do not see that because there was a great civil conflict some years ago in which grave errors were committed in Kansas and elsewhere, to-day in legislating for sixty millions of people and for thirty-eight States to be a hundred in the near future, statesmen and men of reason are to be influenced in giving their votes because of the errors of a past generation or because mistakes of public policy were committed. If we can not rise to consider what these sixty millions of people need, such legislation as shall destroy the pauperism, the inequalities, the wrong, and the suffering which permeate the society of this country everywhere, but must spend our time in idle discussions of the past, we shall contribute but little to the character and the glory of this people and this great nation of States.

It matters not what Mr. Buchanan thought or what wrongs were committed in the Lecompton constitution, what evils were created by the great errors of policy on the part of Southern statesmen or Northern statesmen. Let the dead past bury its dead, and the Senators who to-day seek to represent States and the coming glories of another age and a greater age of human happiness must forget the past and rise to the consideration of the great practical questions of the day.

Why, sir, it seems to me that there ought to be but little trouble in coming to a conclusion on this subject which should satisfy all minds and demonstrate of itself its own propriety. What are the considerations that should govern in the admission of another State to this Union of States? They are but few, and they are plain. It does not concern alone the people of the State to be admitted. Thirty-eight States and sixty millions of other people, of whom they are a component part, have an interest in that question, and it must be decided in reference to not only the thirty-eight States of to-day and the sixty millions of people, but to the hundred millions of people that are soon to be here and the one hundred States of the not distant future.

Extent of territory and of population should decide the admission of new States in the great western empire of States yet to be created. What is that extent of territory? It must be measured by the question of representation in this body, which can not be changed, as it may be in the other House of Congress, by an increasing population. This must be regarded with a view to the hundred States which are soon to be represented here in this body. Manifestly that is true; and we can not regard legislation in reference to the admission of a State to-day and the extent of her territory without some consideration of what is due to the future representation in this body, some consideration of the convenience and necessities of business and legislation and the relative influence of States of larger and smaller size and the condition of public affairs, when a hundred States and a hundred millions of people will live under the protection of our Government.

But, sir, that is not all. Is it not too apparent for discussion, although we have been discussing the question here for days and days, that no State should be admitted without really ascertaining what is the desire of a majority of her people? Can there be any doubt about that? And is not the statement a fact that in this case it is an argument of inference, it is an argument of assumption and presumption, as to what a majority of the people of Dakota desire? Is it a difficult matter to ascertain by some practical legislation? Are the statesmen of this day unable to devise a plan by which the clearly defined will of an actual majority of the people of Dakota shall be ascertained? And are we to have days of discussion and controversy here as to what is the wish of a majority of the people? Reliance is sought to be placed on the fact that a clearly ascertained minority, namely, twenty-seven or twenty-eight thousand actual votes out of more than 55,000 votes in South Dakota alone, favor the admission of the State of South Dakota.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would the Senator from Florida vote for this bill with an amendment which provided for submitting this constitution to these people for their approval before it should go into effect?

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator very candidly that I think the first step most clearly ought to be to ascertain what is the will of a majority of the people, and it matters but little whether you call that an enabling act or by what you phrase it; it is the essential condition of any proper act that a majority of the people should have their will clearly expressed in some satisfactory and definite form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from Florida allow me to ask him which way he has answered my question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly I will. I think very clearly the Senator wishes to know what I would do in regard to this bill. I stated that the first step that should be taken by the honorable Senator, with his great experience here, should be to ascertain what a majority of the people of Dakota desire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But if my friend will permit me——

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the honorable Senator and all his associates who have found difficulties with this bill as it now stands, whether they would be willing to vote for it, considering the great number of this people and the fair fertility of that Territory, if it were provided that it should be sent back to this people, first, to ask them if they will take this constitution as it stands with their approval if we are willing that they should? Will he vote for it then?

Mr. CALL. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I think, as I stated before, that if he will prepare a bill providing for submitting it to the whole people of Dakota to know, first, if they desire to come into the Union as an entire State; and, second, if they prefer to come into the Union as the State of Dakota or as two States, and authorizing them to form a constitution, allowing the whole population to vote and giving them notice under the authority of the Government that they are called upon to come forward and vote upon these propositions and upon the establishment of a constitution, I should vote for such a bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but may I ask the Senator—I do not wish to interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. CALL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would the Senator and his associates, if they will not vote for this bill without an amendment which should provide for submitting this constitution to the people that framed it for their approval, vote for this bill with an amendment which should provide that this constitution shall be submitted to the whole people of the State of Dakota whether they are willing that South Dakota should be set up in this way?

Mr. CALL. I will state my position in regard to that. As the honorable Senator is a lawyer and deals with law and logic, strictly speaking the proper mode and the only authorized mode of proceeding under the Constitution would be to pass an act calling upon those people to form a State, or government, allowing them the privilege of doing so and providing for an election, but as the precedents are and as the act of power by which a State is admitted into the Union exhausts itself and from which there is no appeal, I should say if any great public exigency, if any question of polity to the Government or to the people required the immediate admission of the State of Dakota or any other State either by submitting her constitution to her people or in any other mode, that it would be a proper thing to do.

In the present condition of things I see no necessity for urgent haste; and the first condition, the first manifestly in reason and in law, is to ascertain what the will of the majority of the people of Dakota is, both in reference to her admission as a State and in reference to the division of her territory; not that I believe that Congress is bound to respect the wishes of the people in any Territory with regard to the division of the Territory; not that I do not admit that Congress has the power, and in some cases it may be its duty, to apportion the boundaries in its own sovereign discretion, regardless of the wishes of the people; but in this case I see no reason why such a thing should be done, and therefore I think here should be the first step, because you can not admit a State properly into the Union without some great public exigency demands it unless a majority of her people require and demand that it should be so; for if after being admitted as a State a majority of her people were opposed to exercising these powers, you could not force them to do so.

It would be an anomaly in our system of States that there should be a State with only a minority in favor of exercising the privileges of citizenship and a majority opposed to it and unwilling to do it. Therefore manifestly that is the first step in reason, and it is admitted here that the will of a majority of the people of Dakota has not been expressed in a clear and satisfactory manner. The argument is one of inference, one of information derived from conventions and from individual opinions, from the acts of Legislatures representing the people through an ascertained vote which is itself a minority vote, and therefore I think it is idle for either side here to awake these forgotten memories of the dead past, which should be buried so far as the evil of them is concerned, leaving only the glorious memories of courage and endurance and honest conviction upon both sides a ground and motive for our action on this subject. We have no concern with the crimination and recrimination which has been made in this debate on any part of the people of the United States. No word of censure or applause of them has properly a place here. In all parts of the Union and in every State they are the same people, with the same traditions and the same qualities and characteristics; but the virtues or the faults of the living or the dead, the errors of judgment or the wisdom and forecast of statesmen or parties in the past can not prove that a larger or smaller extent of territory in the new State of Dakota will be better for them or for the other States.

I shall control my vote, therefore, sir, first in reference to the present wants of these sixty millions of people and these thirty-eight States and to the one hundred millions that will be in the near future with the one hundred States that shall be here, and I shall control it by the proposition that the first action in the admission of a State is to ascertain by some clear, proper, practical, and definite mode of expression the will of a majority of the people of the proposed State. It seems to me very unreasonable that it should be claimed that twenty-seven thousand votes can represent or express the will of nearly a half million of people on this or any other subject, but especially in reference to their admission into the Union, where, differing from other elections, the validity of the whole action depends on an actual majority of the people capable of voting; and yet this is the whole argument in this case.

There is no necessity of important public policy demanding immediate action to avoid great danger to the States and the nation as there was in California and in the border States and in Kansas, where a civil war was being waged between two great opposing bodies of opinion, intensified with the most deadly animosities and inflamed into taking the most extreme and unreasonable methods of success; but here happily we are in a time of peace. We are required calmly to consider what extent of territory and what number of population, now and in the future, it is best for them and for all the States the new State of Dakota shall have. We are required to decide what a majority of the people of Dakota want in respect to her admission. We are required to devise the means for an expression of the wishes of all the people and for the protection of the rights and interests of all her people and of the future States and people of the United States.

These are the considerations which will influence and control my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to make a brief explanation in reply to the Senator from Indiana. He says it is not true that he made an attack upon Mr. Boynton and Mr. Johnson. I desire to state exactly what the Senator did in reference to Mr. Boynton, and to show you what the opinions of those two gentlemen are on the subject. I ask to have read a letter sent to me by them as an act of justice to them.

Mr. HARRISON. Put in the letter.

Mr. BUTLER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL HOTEL, Washington, D. C., February 5, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In reading over Senator HARRISON's remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on yesterday, the undersigned have noticed an evident purpose to impugn our motives, if not in a measure to impeach our veracity and standing, as citizens of Dakota.

In reply to any such insinuation or suggestions, you are authorized to say that we hold ourselves in readiness to substantiate in the most public manner every statement or suggestion which either of us has made before the committees of Congress or placed in your hands; and we further pledge ourselves to prove that our standing and representative character in Dakota, where we have lived and been engaged in important business transactions, will bear a favorable comparison with those of any of Senator HARRISON's informants, not excepting Judge Moody, who seems to have filled Senator HARRISON's ears with denunciations of almost every person in Dakota who dares to oppose his life-long ambition of securing a seat in the United States Senate.

In reference to the suggestion made by Senator HARRISON that the same parties, or stage attendants, as he termed them, had been constantly appearing in opposition to his division and Statehood scheme, we will simply say that we have never appeared before any committee of either House of Congress until since the commencement of the present session; hence such slurs and insinuations can not apply to us. As an outside letter addressed by Hugh J. Campbell to Senator VEST has been placed in the RECORD by Senator HARRISON, a public reply to Campbell's letter is inclosed, which you are at liberty to place in the RECORD if you deem proper.

Respectfully,

A. BOYNTON,
L. G. JOHNSON.

Hon. M. C. BUTLER,
United States Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to contribute a little to this interesting episode. After I had finished my speech yesterday afternoon and went to my committee-room one of these gentlemen, Mr. Johnson, who says he understood me to impugn his veracity, came into the committee-room, introduced himself to me, shook hands with me, and congratulated me on my speech. [Laughter, and manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the galleries that by the rules of the Senate there must be no expressions of approbation or disapprobation. While it would be very unpleasant to the Chair, it is made his duty to clear the galleries when a violation of the rules is repeated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is manifest, I think, that the Senators who oppose this bill in its present form admit that they will not vote for it if it shall provide by amendment that this constitution shall be submitted to the people of the counties and district of country proposed to be erected by this bill into a State. If I am wrong in this inference from what the honorable Senator from Florida and others have said, I wait to hear myself corrected.

Mr. CALL. I desire for one to say that I have not said anything of that kind. I have said that I thought at this time it would be far better in the first instance to invite a clear and definite expression of opinion on both these subjects from the people of Dakota; but I have not said what I would do upon a bill presented in that shape and urged for consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was precisely what I had discovered, and therefore I said that I understood from the remarks of the Senator from Florida and gathered from the remarks of other Senators, that they would not vote for this bill if it were amended by the insertion of a clause which should provide for the submission of this constitution to the people who are proposed to be included in this new State; and I said that if I was wrong in that impression I should be glad to be corrected. The Senator from Florida has not corrected me, nor has anybody else.

Mr. BUTLER. Now may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he would consent before submitting this constitution to the people to eliminate from it all else that has been done in the way of the election of officers, United States Senators and Representatives to Congress and governor and members of the Legislature? That is the question I should like to ask.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer it with the very greatest cheerfulness—no, I would not at the present time. After all these years of application by these people to be admitted to the Union either as a whole or as a part, I would say now there is here a constitution that a portion of you at least have agreed upon; that is a constitution like the constitutions of all the other States in respect of the security of private rights, the orderly management of government, the administration of justice, the equal levying of taxes, and everything that goes to make up the best of modern constitutions; I would not put you off for one or two or three years if you want this thing, because there is no suggestion that the constitution itself is not a good one. I would say, therefore, "Are you willing to be a State with this constitution?" Would my honorable friend from South Carolina go for that?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, I have indicated very clearly what I would go for, and I think the same object may be accomplished by the enabling act which I have proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By which the Senator means that he will not vote for that.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I have not said that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but he will say it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say this, that if the Senator will consent to begin de novo and submit this question to the whole Territory divested of all this paraphernalia of office-holding and politicians that surround it, it would present a very different question and one that I would consider.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That he would consider!

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says he would not consent to do that, and therefore it is perfectly unnecessary for me to give my opinion as to what I should do under any such circumstances.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have stated that I will not consent to the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina. I ask him and his associates if they will consent to go for this bill with a proposition that leaves this constitution as it stands to the people who framed it?

Mr. BUTLER. And all the officers?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from South Carolina does not choose to answer that question, by which I infer that he will not vote for such a proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Clearly not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I have a definite answer.

Mr. BUTLER. Clearly not with this annex that it has, what purport to be two United States Senators, a Representative to Congress, and so on and so on. I will state very frankly that I would not support it under those circumstances.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I am glad to have such frankness from the Senator from South Carolina. Now, I understand the proposition——

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will allow me to go on. Then the objection of the Senator from South Carolina is that this irregular autonomy, as he styles it, has added to it—I am not quoting his language, but giving the idea—that this irregular autonomy which has been set up there awaiting the approval of Congress is bad, because they have proceeded to elect State officers and United States Senators, as all their predecessors in other Territories had done. Now suppose we submit this constitution to this people; if, as the Senator from South Carolina supposes, there is anything disagreeable to them in this arrangement and the consequence that has followed, the people of Dakota can vote it down; but if that people are willing to take this constitution with the burden of a State government already elected, why should the Senator from South Carolina or the Senator from Vermont object to it? I should be glad to wait for an answer to that.

If the people do not want this constitution with what follows from it, they have only to say no. But I think the Senator from South Carolina is fearful—if I may venture timidly to use such a phrase to him—that to what he considers to be the wrong and the burden of these particular State officers and particular Senators the people of that Territory would say yes, after all. If they did, what business is it to us? Have they not the right to say whom they will prefer to have for State officers and Senators, or are we to decide upon that?

Mr. BUTLER. I will tell the Senator why I would not do it. I do not think the people would have a fair chance with all this Statehood, as it is called. I think with the influences brought to bear by United State Senators, governor, State officers, and so on, they could not perhaps give as fair an expression of their opinion as if they had the simple naked question of the constitution presented. That is my apprehension about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the proposition now. I beg to assure the honorable Senator from South Carolina that I know a good many people in Dakota.——

Mr. BUTLER. So do I.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And they have come from States and from previous experiences in this world where the influence of governors and judges and Senators does not amount to much in the free expression of their independent will. They do not come from States where it is sometimes said, and I am afraid truly, that the public will is coerced and overborne by the autonomy of State officers and State officials and State senators. They have been born and raised under situations which make them independent men, and they are able to take care of their liberties and their rights and to understand what is meant by them, and therefore the idea of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that if you send this constitution loaded with the election of these officers to these people they will be influenced and overborne by that to do what they otherwise would not, is a great mistake, and he does a great injustice to the people of Dakota in so saying.

So then, Mr. President, we find that under no present circumstance returning this to the will of this people who have formed this constitution or to the will of the people of the whole Territory to say whether they are willing to take it, will the Senators represented by the honorable Senators from South Carolina, Florida, and Alabama agree to have them express their opinion on that. It is useless, therefore, to try to obtain their support to this measure by any such proposition. That being the case, the only thing is to go forward with this bill and let it take its chance, wherever it may go.

Here are a people numbering now more than a quarter of a million—free, intelligent, wealthy, prosperous, educated, with all the things that make up a well-regulated society, with fertile lands, with mines, with enterprise, with everything that would go to make a great and good State—asking to be admitted into the brotherhood and sisterhood of our States, and the objection to it, when you simmer it down, is simply the fact, as it is now stated, that they have gone in advance of an enabling act to do that very thing.

I am one of those who maintain that the people of no Territory have a right to stay as a Territory forever, even if they wish to do so. In respect to pecuniary expense it is a great benefit to the people of a Territory to be a Territorial people. The Congress of the United States pays a very large part of the expenses of carrying on the Territorial government; and therefore I maintain that when the people of a Territory are in a condition to take on Statehood, whether the majority of them like it or not, they ought to be induced to do that thing, in order that we may be relieved from that burden, in order that the theory of the American Government can be carried out, that there shall be complete local State government and State sovereignty over the objects that it covers in the localities where justice is to be administered and the operations of government carried on.

As the Senator from Florida very well remarked, it is clear that no question of the division of a Territory, the lines that should include a new State, is one that belongs to the people of that Territory of themselves alone. Their wishes and their opinions and their facts are entitled to consideration undoubtedly, but beyond that it is for the Congress of the United States, all the States together, to say what ought to be the true and correct boundaries of a State and what ought to make up the autonomy of a people who are to come into this Union. The Senator from Florida is quite right and has stated the proposition with great clearness. That is this case. Here you have from the configurations of nature, the course of the streams, the arrangement that Providence has made in respect of the ease and convenience of society there, proof of the propriety of dividing this immense Territory upon an east and west line. Here you have a people growing all the time, increasing in everything that makes up a good society, filling up that Territory, and they are ready to come in. Senators are unwilling to even leave them to say now again whether they are ready to come in; so that it is opposition on something else than that. What is it? Nobody can tell, except the circumstance that these people happen to have a large preponderance of a political opinion one way. My theory is that every people that are fit for self-government at all ought to have a political opinion one way or the other, and it is the misfortune of fate to the gentlemen on the other side that these particular people happen to have a political opinion that they do not seem to agree with, and that is what is the matter.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I should like to ask him a question. I would like the honorable Senator to state what would be the difference practically in passing an act authorizing the people of Dakota to form a State government and a constitution and submitting it to them to vote what is their will upon both questions? Congress is not bound to accept that will, I agree entirely with him, in the exercise of the wise discretion which on our part we are authorized to exercise. Inasmuch as there is controversy and opposition in the Territory and as we have no evidence here which is clear and definite as to what is the will of the people, either in respect to the division or in respect to the State government and the constitution that they have adopted, what would be the practical difference and what the hardship, in the present state of our information upon that subject, with the admitted fact in the argument that what is the will of that people is a matter of inference, is a matter of presumption, without any clear and definite expression, nothing but a minority of the votes being brought here—what is the practical hardship in the present state of things in having an act authorizing the people of Dakota to express their opinion at an election, due notice being given first, as to whether they wish to come into the Union, authorizing them to call a convention and form a constitution, which may adopt this and elect these same officers? That being done, the State is admitted. In reference also to the division of the Territory, what is the practical difference?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The practical difference is that it keeps these people out of the capacity to govern themselves for an indefinite period of time, because after such an enabling act as the Senator states it, it must again come to Congress and we must go over all this thing again; and, applying it personally, it is the same difference between a man who wants pay to which he is entitled to-day being told by his debtor, "I will pay you next week, and if it is not convenient next week I will have a conference with you week after next." That is the difference. It is a mere method of staving off what is manifest—and everybody agrees to that—that the condition of these people is such as to entitle them and require them to take on the duties that belong to a State and to govern themselves and help us, representing a great people, to govern all the people of the United States within the sphere of our action. That is the difference.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, we are about to vote on this proposition now, as I understand it. I am paired on all questions connected with it with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is absent, and, as I shall be marked "absent" on the yea-and-nay vote, as I believe all persons who are paired are, I wish briefly to explain my position. I do not desire to take part in the discussion; I have not done so, and will not. I desire only to state my position briefly.

I will vote cheerfully for the admission of Dakota with the boundary lines laid down by the Congress of the United States for the Territory now organized. I deny the right of the people to divide a Territory once organized by Congress, and come here and raise a clamor for the admission of part of it. I deny that any such action has been taken by the people of that whole Territory as makes the thing now presented fair. What is it? Dividing it in two, with an Indian reservation occupying nearly half of that portion which now seeks admission. That is not a fair thing to do; and I am by no means convinced that it is wise in us to multiply the Senators in the Senate of the United States to an undue number because of the territorial area of the States admitted. If the Territories as now organized in the present form should be admitted there will after a while be one hundred Senators. If there are a half million people in Dakota now and Dakota is divided into two States four Senators will come here from that Territory to offset the States of New York and Pennsylvania on this floor or Kentucky and Tennessee. If this is to be done, it ought to be upon very good and careful grounds.

I had hoped that Dakota would come as a State with the territorial lines defined by Congress; whether Republican or Democratic I care not. I would not consider that question in looking at the matter of admission, but I do not believe—and I know Dakota pretty well—that that Territory is going to grow as rapidly as many gentlemen think. It has been pushed rapidly. Railroads have been made there, but they are only valuable when immigrants are brought there and when their products can be hauled over the railroads which have been constructed in advance of settlements. A very large proportion of the people there are Scandinavians, many of them not citizens of the United States in any proper sense, brought there by immigration companies, brought there by railway companies, working to produce crops of wheat without being to any extent farmers, neither raising stock nor anything else. Great farms are there, where men are employed five or six months and away the rest of the year.

While it may grow reasonably it will not grow as rapidly, as it has grown in times gone by; and I doubt whether we ought to give four Senators to that Territory. The result will be to make this body a mob if we divide all the other Territories because of their great area. While we can arrange the House of Representatives in its numbers by increasing the ratio of representation, each State is obliged to have two Senators under the Constitution.

I only desired to say this much, as I shall not be able to vote. I am willing to vote to admit the whole Territory as a State, but not to admit a part of it or for any division of it. It is because I shall be marked "absent" on account of my pair that I have deemed it proper to say this much.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. HARRISON. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I desire to announce now that I am paired on this and every other question connected with this bill with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent. I would vote "yea" and he would vote "nay" on this particular proposition.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] informed me a little while since that he was about to leave the Chamber, and I agreed to pair with him upon this question. If the Senator were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN (when Mr. KENNA'S name was called). In the absence of the colleague of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] I wish to state that Mr. KENNA is detained at home by reason of illness in his family and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If Mr. KENNA were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is absent from the Chamber temporarily and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired, as I am informed, with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PLUMB. Before voting I wish to state that I am paired generally with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], with the privilege, however, of transferring the pair. I, therefore, transfer his pair to the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DOLPH. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 33; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now formally offer the amendment of my colleague [Mr. VEST], who is sick and unavoidably detained at home, an amendment which was submitted some days ago and printed. It provides for the division of the Territory on a line running north and south and for a Territorial government for the eastern and western parts of the Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri offers for adoption an amendment which will be read.

Mr. HARRISON. Does it need to be read?

Mr. ALLISON. We understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the reading is called for, it need not be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the amendment at the request of my colleague, who can not be here. It has been printed, and I have no doubt the Senators are generally acquainted with it, and I shall not insist upon its being read unless some Senator on the other side desires it.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps we had better have the yeas and nays on it. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall not insist on its being read unless some Senator on the other side desires it.

Mr. HARRISON. No; we have all read it.

Mr. ALLISON. We all understand it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say that I am in favor of a division of the Territory, and did not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina because I do not believe as large an area of country as was embraced within the limits of his amendment should be admitted, with the sparse population it has, as a State in the Union.

The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That all that part of the territory of the United States now constituting a portion of the Territory of Dakota and described as follows, to wit: Commencing at a point where the forty-ninth degree of north latitude crosses the twenty-third degree and forty minutes meridian of longitude west from Washington; thence due south on the twenty-third degree and forty minutes meridian of longitude west from Washington until it strikes a bend in the Missouri River; thence down the main channel of the river to the boundary line of the State of Nebraska at the mouth of the Niobrara or Running Water River; thence westerly along the north boundary line of the State of Nebraska to the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington at the eastern boundary line of the Territory of Wyoming; thence northerly on the eastern line of Wyoming and the eastern line of Montana Territories to the forty-ninth degree of north latitude at the southern boundary of the British possessions; thence easterly along the southern line of the British possessions and the forty-ninth degree of north latitude to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby, organized into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Lincoln.

SEC. 25. SEC. 28. That that territory hereby created into the Territory of Lincoln shall be divided into three judicial districts, as follows: All that portion north of the forty-sixth degree of latitude, excepting that part of the Territory south of the Cannon Ball River, between Hettinger County and the Missouri River, comprising the counties of Morton, Hettinger, Stark, Bowman, Villard, Dunn, McKenzie, Williams, Mercer, Wallace, Allred, Buford, Flannery, Montrille, Renville, Winn, Stevens, McLean, and the western portions of Bottineau, McHenry, Sheridan, and Burleigh, and any subdivisions of counties made by the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory or by this act shall constitute the second judicial district; that all that portion of the Territory of Lincoln lying west of the Missouri River, comprising the counties of Boreman, Dewey, Schnasse, Wagner, Rinehart, Choteau, Martin, Ewing, Burdick, Harding, Butte, Lawrence, Scobey, Mandan, Delano, Pyatt, and any other subdivisions of counties made by the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory or by this act shall constitute the first judicial district; that all that portion of the Territory of Lincoln west of the Missouri River not embraced in the first and second judicial districts shall comprise and constitute the third judicial district. Each of the before-mentioned judicial districts shall have jurisdiction over United States cases within their respective boundaries, the same as the courts now exercise in the first judicial district of Dakota Territory; and the district courts for said districts hereby created, exercising jurisdiction of circuit and district courts for said districts, shall be held as follows: For the first district, at Deadwood; for the second district, at Bismarck; for the third district, at Rapid City; in the first and second judicial districts, at the time fixed by the laws of the Territory of Dakota for the general terms of court in the counties of Lawrence and Burleigh; and in the third judicial district, at such times as the presiding judge may direct, until otherwise provided by the Legislative Assembly. And all United States suits, actions, proceedings, and indictments now pending or commenced under the jurisdiction of the first, second, and sixth judicial districts of the Territory of Dakota, and all Territorial suits, actions, proceedings, and indictments now pending or commenced in the first, second, or sixth judicial districts shall not abate, but shall be heard, tried, and determined in the various judicial district courts herein provided for in the same manner as if they had been commenced therein before the change in the judicial districts as herein specified; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of the courts of the various counties, as fixed before the passage of this act, to transcribe and deliver, under the direction of the presiding judge, all records and papers in the pending cases to the proper judicial officers in the judicial districts to which this act assigns them by reason of changing the boundaries of the several judicial districts in said Territory, and not triable in the judicial districts where they were originally commenced.

SEC. 29. That the counties of Bottineau, McHenry, Sheridan, Burleigh, and any other counties which are divided by the creation of the Territory of Lincoln shall be organized as follows: That portion of each of the counties thus divided which contains the county seat shall be entitled to the name of the county and the county buildings erected thereat; and the balance of the counties thus severed shall be named and reorganized by the governor of the Territory of Dakota and the governor of the Territory of Lincoln, as now provided by the laws of the Territory of Dakota. The governor of the Territory of Lincoln and the governor of the Territory of Dakota, and the judges of the judicial districts in which any county is situated which is divided by this act, are constituted a commission to appraise the county buildings to the portion of the county where they are located, and also to have full power to apportion and fix the amount of outstanding indebtedness which each portion of the county thus severed by this act shall assume and pay; and the said judges shall each have full power to enforce the amount fixed by said commission against the respective portions of the counties thus divided, or which may be assigned to any other counties which are embraced in their respective judicial districts in the Territories of Dakota and Lincoln.

SEC. 30. That all the outstanding bonds issued by the Territory of Dakota, under authority of the Legislative Assembly, for the erection and furnishing of the penitentiary at Bismarck, for the erection and furnishing of the normal school at Spearfish, and for the erection and furnishing of the school of mines at Rapid City, in the Territory of Lincoln hereby created, shall be assumed and paid, principal and interest, according to their tenor, by the Territory of Lincoln, and said buildings shall become the property of said Territory of Lincoln; that all of the bonds of said Territory of Dakota heretofore issued under authority of the Legislative Assembly shall be assumed and paid, principal and interest, according to their tenor, by the Territory of Dakota, and all Territorial buildings situated in the limits of the Territory of Dakota as fixed by this act shall belong to and remain the property of the said Territory of Dakota; and that all records, books, papers, and archives appertaining to the Territory of Dakota shall be transferred, in accordance with this act, to the temporary seat of government at Aberdeen.

SEC. 31. That immediately upon the appointment and qualification of a governor for the Territory of Lincoln, he shall appoint a Territorial treasurer, auditor, superintendent of public instruction, and such other Territorial officers as are provided for by the laws of the Territory of Dakota; and the Territorial treasurer thus appointed shall be entitled to receive from the Territorial treasury of Dakota Territory a proportionate amount of all Territorial funds in the hands of the treasurer of Dakota Territory, or which may come into his hands under any assessment made at the time this act goes into effect, to be computed on the basis of the last assessment made by the Territorial board of equalization; and the treasurer of the Territory of Dakota shall pay over to the treasurer of the Territory of Lincoln the sum found to be due said Territory of Lincoln under said division, taking his receipt therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the words, in the sixth line of the first section, "and State government," and to strike out "are" and insert "is" in the eighth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. HARRISON. I do this at the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, and I only stop to mention that at the last session of Congress he made quite a satisfactory argument on the proposition that no State ought to be proclaimed in the Union by proclamation of the President, and yet the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, upon which we have just voted, contained that provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "and State government," and in line 8 of the same section to strike out the word "are" and insert "is;" so as to read:

And is hereby admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and that the constitution which the people of Dakota have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this bill pass?

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). On the passage of the bill I desire to announce again my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). As I announced a few moments ago, I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on all questions in respect to this measure. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN (when Mr. KENNA'S name was called). On the passage of this bill I desire to say, as upon the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. Were Mr. KENNA present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I make on this vote the same announcement as before, that I am paired generally with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but I have transferred the pair to the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD], and will vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If the Senator from Rhode Island were here, he would have voted "yea." I suppose the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If the Senator from Colorado were present, he would vote "yea" and I am not at liberty to state how the other gentleman would vote.

Mr. GRAY. As I stated on a previous vote, I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 22; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the preamble of the bill.

The preamble was agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. PLUMB. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; let him take up his bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate adjourn till Monday next.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the vote is taken I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent of the Senate to debate the question on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from New Hampshire is to have unanimous consent, I shall ask unanimous consent to say something when he gets through.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will come to order.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects to consent being given.

Mr. PLUMB. If there is to be any debate on this question I insist on my motion that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate do now adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. Now, before the question is taken, I desire the opportunity of saying a word, because the Senator will see——

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this a debatable question?

Mr. BLAIR. What I say is this——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects to debate, and therefore it is the duty of the Chair——

Mr. BLAIR. Which gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. The senior Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know but that the question was unnecessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). Not regarding this in any sense as a party question I voted "yea," but I see there is a good deal of division, and as I do not know how the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is absent would vote, I withdraw my vote to be on the safe side.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask permission of the House for that committee to sit during the sessions of the House on to-day, to-morrow, and Monday next.

Mr. HIESTAND. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HIESTAND] will permit me to explain I think he will not insist upon his objection. To-day, and to-morrow, and Monday have been set apart by the Committee on Commerce to hear the representatives of railroad companies in relation to several bills pending before the committee; a number of those representatives are now in the city, and if the hearing is limited to the hour before the session of the House begins each day, the committee will be prevented from giving these gentlemen as full a hearing as it desires to give them. The committee wishes to accommodate as many of them as it can, and I trust that the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to make the objection. That is all I have to say.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 5155, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Committee on Territories will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The gentleman will please send the bill to the desk, so that the Chair can see whether that is the proper reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the bill to which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] refers is not yet printed. The gentleman had better withdraw his request for the present.

Mr. CAREY. I will do so.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. PINDAR, by unanimous consent the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3569) granting a pension to Ellen Bishop; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

R. 5200) for the relief of Edward Fenlen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 690 was laid on the table.

ALEXANDER COOPER, JESSE WILLIAMS, AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4630) for the relief of Alexander Cooper, Jesse Williams, and others; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. GEDDES. I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to submit some adverse reports, and perhaps it is proper to say they are based upon claims referred by the Committee on War Claims to the Court of Claims and certified back. They are based on the action and finding of fact by the Court of Claims. Accompanying each report the finding of the Court of Claims, certified——

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate finding in each case?

Mr. GEDDES. Yes; there is a separate finding in each case and a separate report in each case, and they are separately placed there in order that no confusion may arise.

The SPEAKER. Was there not a general letter transmitting these findings to the committee?

Mr. GEDDES. I think not; none was called to my attention. They came to us from time to time separately. I have here also a favorable report from the Committee on War Claims on one of these findings.

The SPEAKER. Through the action of the House have they been sent to the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. GEDDES. No.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair can not see how the gentleman can report them to the House, as they relate to matters which have not been referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. GEDDES. They were referred to the Committee by the House and by the committee referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act of March 3, 1883, and by the provisions of that act they have been certified back to the committee. Being certified back to the Committee on War Claims by the Court of Claims, we are required by the Bowman act, as I take it, to make some report upon them. The law itself provides they shall go upon the Calendar and remain there from Congress to Congress until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman is correct. The Chair will examine the law.

Mr. GEDDES. I examined it, as I supposed, quite carefully in order to get these matters here. Otherwise they would be buried in the pigeon-holes of the committee. I have here the favorable action of the Court of Claims in one case, and in order that it may be brought before the House for action it is necessary it should be reported back from the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read section 7 of the Bowman act, which perhaps covers it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That reports of the Court of Claims under this act if not finally acted on during the session at which they are reported shall be continued from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, until the same shall be finally acted on.

The SPEAKER. That is, the report of the Court of Claims is to be continued, not the original bill which was introduced in the last Congress and referred to the Committee on War Claims. The report of the Court of Claims when it comes back to Congress will be continued from session to session. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to say that the Court of Claims has made no report to Congress, but has sent certain certificates to the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. GEDDES. That is the fact.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I think this practice should be settled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have it settled now.

Mr. SPRINGER. Several cases of that kind came to the Committee on Claims, but I have always observed the parties in interest have introduced new bills and had them referred, and those bills have been accompanied by these reports from the Court of Claims. I think the proper practice would be to introduce new bills.

Mr. GEDDES. And so the Committee on War Claims has acted in the present case. We now report a new bill. We do not report the original bill that was referred to the Committee on War Claims because the papers in the case on which it is based go to the Court of Claims, where they remain. They are not returned to the Committee on War Claims; the only paper returned to that committee from the Court of Claims is the finding of the Court of Claims, upon which we base a bill and report. For that reason these papers are reported back in this form.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Ohio will see that the difficulty presented is this: The act provides that the Court of Claims shall certify the facts in the case "to the committee making the reference or to the House." Now, the Chair thinks that a proper construction of that provision of the statute is that if the Court of Claims finds the facts during the session of Congress at which they were referred to the court, so that the same committee exists which referred them to the court and which has the bill before it, the court would properly report its findings back to that committee. But such is not the case in this instance. The Forty-eighth Congress, whose committee referred these claims to the court, has expired, and a new Congress has commenced and a new Committee on War Claims has been appointed—a committee which never had the subject before it. The Chair thinks that the report of the Court of Claims under such circumstances should be made to the House and by the House referred to the committee for its action, thereby conferring upon the committee jurisdiction.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that during the last Congress the Committee on Claims referred a number of claims to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman act. Some of these were acted upon during that session, and so far as I know the Court of Claims in each instance reported its findings back to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that was correct.

Mr. McMILLIN. And in the committee we took that as the finding of the court to control the committee so far as we thought proper. But I submit the proper course to be pursued in the present instance is that suggested by the Speaker. Where they are returned by the court to a subsequent Congress the House refers them, with the other papers, to the committee having the matter in charge, and they are not there conclusive on the committee, but are simply argumentative facts found by the court. The committee can give them as much weight in its final disposition of the case as it sees proper to give them.

Mr. GEDDES. But the papers having been referred by the Committee on War Claims——

The SPEAKER. In the last House.

Mr. GEDDES. In the Forty-eighth Congress; the papers are not before the committee, but remain with the court, for the claimants in these cases do not refile the papers in the Forty-ninth Congress. The cases are pending in the Court of Claims.

Mr. McMILLIN. I submit, to the gentleman from Ohio that when the Court of Claims shall have found the facts and reported back to Congress its findings, then it is proper, when the matter has been rereferred to the Committee on War Claims, for that committee to get the original papers on application to the Court of Claims, just as we do in pension cases where the Committee on Pensions desires to examine papers which have been acted upon in the first instance by the Pension Office.

The SPEAKER. Unless the course suggested by the Chair is pursued the gentleman from Ohio will see at once the difficulty that must arise. Claims are referred to the Court of Claims by a committee of a preceding Congress, and that court certifies its findings to a committee of a succeeding Congress. If that committee without any reference of the subject to it by the House can report bills back here, the Journals of the House of this Congress will not show that the committee had any jurisdiction whatever over the subject-matter upon which they make a report.

The Chair thinks the report should be withheld at least for the present. The Court of Claims should certify the findings to the House, and the House will then refer the same to the Committee on War Claims, which will give that committee jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. ROWELL. I would like to make a suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROWELL. By a rule of the last House a report was required to be made by these committees of the disposition of these cases where they were referred to the Court of Claims. It seems to me that the Court of Claims in sending these reports back to the committee have construed the Bowman act, and by that construction the court determines itself where these papers ought to go.

The SPEAKER. The act provides:

> When the facts shall have been found the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee, or to the House, by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

The Chair thinks the meaning of that is, if the court reports to the committee, it must report to the same committee which referred the claim and which has the matter then before it. But if the report does not come from the court until another Congress assembles and a new committee appointed, it must be made to the House, so that the House can refer the matter to the committee and thereby invest it with jurisdiction.

Mr. GEDDES. I will withdraw the report for the present.

COLUMBIA BANK, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 2140) for the relief of the Columbia Bank, in Pennsylvania.

Mr. HIESTAND. I desire to have that bill placed on the Calendar, and also ask leave to present the views of the minority.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the report, with the views of the minority, ordered to be printed.

JOHN S. KENDRICK.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 818) for the relief of John S. Kendrick, executor of Amanda Goggin, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS W. HALDEMAN.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 658) for the relief of Francis W. Haldeman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ERNEST H. WARDWELL.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1062) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. EUNICE S. NICHOLS.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 207) for the relief of Mrs. Eunice S. Nichols; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS H. KIRMAYER.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1083) granting a pension to Francis H. Kirmayer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY B. CARLL.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1106) granting a pension to Mary B. Carll; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of standing and select committees for reports has now been completed.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. HIESTAND. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his objection to the request made by the gentleman from Texas for leave to the Committee on Commerce to sit during the sitting of the House to-day, to-morrow, and Monday. If there be no further objection, leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

FRANCES E. STEWART.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, the sum of $3,160.50, which shall be in full of all balances due the estate of said Michael S. Stewart, deceased, growing out of a contract made on or about the 10th day of December, 1864, between the said Michael S. Stewart and Capt. George B. Hibbard, then assistant quartermaster at Nashville, Tenn., by which the said Michael S. Stewart agreed to cut and deliver 10,000 cords of wood at the Cumberland River for the use of the Army, &c.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, have given careful consideration to the same, and ask to report:

That this claim was presented to the Forty-eighth Congress, and a report was made by the Committee on Claims of the Senate on the 19th of December, 1882. As the examination by your committee has led them substantially to the same results with those arrived at by the Senate committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, they do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but refer to that report, and thereto annex a copy for information.

Your committee report herewith a bill, and recommend its passage.

[Senate Report No. 6, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred a bill (S. 47) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, having examined the same, make the following report:

That the Committee on Claims at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress made an adverse report upon this bill; that subsequently, additional facts and circumstances having been discovered, the bill was again presented to the Forty-sixth Congress, and at the third session thereof favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Claims; that at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress the bill was again presented, and having been carefully examined by the Senate Committee on Claims, the committee made a favorable report upon the same, and adopted as their own the report of the Committee on Claims made at the previous session.

Your committee, having carefully re-examined the case, consider that the facts are substantially embodied in, and the merits of the claim established by, the said report of the Senate Committee on Claims made at the third session of the Forty-sixth Congress, and therefore adopt as their own said report No. 832, which is as follows:

"The facts, as presented by the evidence submitted, are these: On or about the 10th day of December, A. D. 1864, the said Michael S. Stewart entered into a verbal contract, at Nashville, Tenn., with one George B. Hibbard, then captain and assistant quartermaster United States Army, stationed at Nashville, in charge of forage and fuel, by which he agreed to cut and deliver 10,000 cords of wood for the use of the Government of the United States in supplying fuel for the quartermaster's department and troops stationed in and about Nashville. Said wood was delivered by said Stewart on the banks of the Cumberland River within 25 miles of the city of Nashville, and for which he was to receive $6 per cord. No time within which such wood was to be delivered was fixed, except that it was to be delivered, to use the language of the original claimant, 'as rapidly as possible.' That, although said contract was not in writing, a memorandum thereof was made by Captain Hibbard, who subsequently transferred the same to his successor, Capt. W. Mills, Seventy-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and acting assistant quartermaster. The affidavit of Capt. George B. Hibbard, with whom this contract was made, is filed with the papers, is brief, and in these words:

"'That during the month of December, 1864, I was stationed at Nashville, county and State aforesaid (Davidson County, Tennessee), in charge of forage and fuel; that on or about the 10th day of said month I entered into a verbal contract or agreement with one M. S. Stewart, a loyal citizen of county and State aforesaid, to cut and deliver 10,000 cords of wood for the use of the United States Government, in supplying fuel for the Quartermaster's Department and troops stationed in and about Nashville, Tenn.; that said wood was to be delivered by said M. S. Stewart on the banks of the Cumberland River, within 25 miles of the city of Nashville; that I agreed to allow said Stewart the sum of $6 per cord for said wood; that soon after making said contract or agreement with said Stewart I was relieved of the charge of fuel, and that I transferred a memorandum of said contract to my successor, Capt. W. Mills, Seventy-fourth Ohio Infantry, and acting assistant quartermaster.'

"It further appears, from the affidavit of Capt. W. Mills, who succeeded Hibbard, and who remained in charge of that position until June, 1865, that said Stewart delivered under said contract 2,000 cords of wood, which was received by said Captain Mills for the use of the Government, and for which Stewart received his pay at $5 per cord, the contract price.

"Captain Mills's affidavit is in these words:

"'I, W. Mills, late captain and acting assistant quartermaster, being duly sworn according to law, depose and say that during the latter part of the year 1864 and up to June, 1865, I was stationed at Nashville, Tenn., in charge of fuel, among other duties, and that during that period I received over 2,000 cords of wood of one M. S. Stewart, a loyal citizen of said county (Davidson County, Tennessee) and State aforesaid, in pursuance of a verbal contract made between said M. S. Stewart and Capt. George B. Hibbard, I having succeeded said Captain Hibbard, and been instructed from the chief quartermaster's department to carry out all of Captain Hibbard's contracts. Said wood was delivered on the banks of the Cumberland, within 25 miles of Nashville, and was paid for at the contract price of $5 per cord. On the last of May, 1865, I notified said M. S. Stewart that the Government would require no more wood chopped, and, having been relieved of the fuel department by Maj. A. J. Wills, this deponent knows of no further action in the premises.'

"The foregoing affidavit was made March 28, 1866. Subsequently, on July 10, 1866, Captain Mills made another affidavit, in which he says:

"'M. S. Stewart was a contractor to furnish the Government with wood. It was a difficult matter to supply this post (Nashville) with fuel during the war, and it became necessary to buy in open market, the bonded contractors being prevented by the enemy and high water from supplying the requisite quantity of wood. This Mr. M. S. Stewart, with other parties, had contracted with Capt. George B. Hibbard, assistant quartermaster, to furnish more or less of wood, as the condition of the military situation would permit; but before the said Stewart had delivered any the fuel department had been transferred to me, and Capt. George B. Hibbard gave me, on a written memorandum, the name of M. S. Stewart as one of his contractors; and in pursuance thereof I did buy for the Government wood of the said Stewart. Said memorandum was not preserved.'

"On the 2d of November, 1864, as per alleged copy of certificate filed (this date is evidently a mistake, as the contract was not made until December 10, 1864), Capt. George B. Hibbard issued the following request:

"'ASSISTANT QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
"'FUEL AND FORAGE DEPARTMENT,
"'Nashville, Tenn., November 2, 1864.

"'To whom it may concern:

"'Mr. M. S. Stewart has contracted to deliver me 10,000 cords of wood on the Cumberland River for the use of the Government. He will need all of his hay and grain to feed his teams used in delivering said wood; therefore I request all persons whomsoever to leave his crops unmolested.

"'GEO. B. HIBBARD,
"'Captain and Assistant Quartermaster.'

"The affidavit of Robert McKenzie, an employé of the post quartermaster's department at Nashville, after referring to the delivery of wood by Stewart under his contract, states as follows:

"'That some time near the 23d or 26th day of May, 1865, I was ordered by the said Capt. William Mills, acting assistant quartermaster, to notify the said M. S. Stewart to stop chopping wood upon said contract, and also notified him that the wood then cut would be taken in accordance with said contract. All this was done under the orders and authority of the said Captain Mills, acting assistant quartermaster.'

"In pursuance of this contract it appears that M. S. Stewart purchased all the standing timber on a 160-acre tract of land lying near the Cumberland River, some 18 miles below Nashville, paying therefor $1.50 per cord. He hired woodchoppers and took all necessary steps to carry out his contract, and cut in all 3,203 cords, 2,000 cords of which had been received and paid for by the Government at the contract price, $5 per cord, prior to May 31, 1865, when he (Stewart) was notified by Assistant Quartermaster Mills not to cut any more wood, but that the Government would receive that already cut and not delivered—1,203 cords. Subsequently to this Assistant Quartermaster Mills received and paid for 300 cords, leaving on Stewart's hands 903 cords, which the Government declined to take or pay for.

"The evidence shows clearly that Stewart did have this amount of wood left on his hands, to wit, 903 cords. Sixty cords, however, of this amount were not hauled to the river bank, but remained in the forest where cut, some half a mile distant from the river bank, while 843 cords were hauled to the river bank.

"It is claimed by petitioner that the actual cost of purchasing the timber, and cutting, hauling, cording, &c., this 903 cords was $5 per cord; in all $4,946.70, made up as follows:

Cost of 903 cords standing wood, at $1.50 per cord	$1,354 50
Chopping 903 cords, at $1.75	1,580 25
Hauling 903 cords, at $1.50	1,354 50
Re-cording wood on river bank, at 15 cents per cord	136 45
To services of G. B. Stewart, superintendent, two months, at $150 per month	300 00
Services of F. Kibbler, foreman, at $100 per month	200 00
	4,946 70

"As the evidence shows that 60 cords of this wood were not hauled from the woods to the river bank, the item charged for hauling is $90 too high, and the item for re-cording on the river bank is $9 too high. The account also contains four errors in calculation, the correction of which would further lessen the aggregate amount of expenses to the extent of $22, making the amount actually expended by Mr. Stewart on said 903 cords $4,825.70.

"From the records of the office of the Quartermaster-General it appears that on the 8th of October, 1866, the contractor (M. S. Stewart) presented to that Department his claim for $4,946.70, being, as was alleged, the actual expense incurred by him in purchasing and preparing for delivery 903 cords of wood. After a thorough investigation this claim was disallowed by the Quartermaster-General in toto, and on appeal to the Secretary of War that officer, under the opinion of the Judge-Advocate, approved the action of the Quartermaster-General.

"The original petition in regard to this claim was presented to the Senate on January 6, 1874, and on April 12, 1876, the Committee on Claims made an adverse report upon it, which was agreed to by the Senate.

"That petition asked that the Government would pay to petitioner—as the administratrix of the original claimant, which the evidence shows her to be—the full contract price of said wood, making no mention of the fact that the original contractor, by disposing of it to other parties after the Government's refusal to accept it, had protected himself from loss to the extent of $2.50 per cord.

"The petition which we are now considering, after crediting the Government with $2.50 a cord as realized from the sale of said wood after the Government's refusal to accept it (and which rate per cord the proof in the case shows was actually realized for 843 cords of it), asks that the Government will pay to the petitioner, as administratrix aforesaid, the balance of the sum due to the petitioner's intestate according to the terms of the contract, namely, the sum of $3,160.50.

"The committee's adverse report was based mainly upon the legal proposition that under the act of June 2, 1862 (12 Stats. at Large, page 220), the contract for the purchase of the wood was not binding on the United States, because not in writing; although it further declared that the claim did not present such peculiar equities as to entitle it to consideration aside from its strictly legal aspect.

"The act of June 2, 1862 (12 Stats. at Large, page 220), is in these words:

"'SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services, in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the article or articles, or performance of the service, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals. No contract or purchase shall hereafter be made, unless the same be authorized by law or be under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.'

"In this case it was insisted before the War Department and before the committee, when they formerly considered it, that Captain Hibbard had a right to make a verbal contract or parol agreement, from the fact that the public exigency which creates the exception in the act quoted existed. This, however, was a matter to be determined from all the circumstances surrounding the case, and the War Department and the Senate Committee on Claims in the Forty-fourth Congress decided, upon the facts then brought to their notice, that the public exigency creating the exception in the act quoted did not exist.

"But since then the fact, which was overlooked when this claim was formerly under consideration, has been brought to the attention of this committee, that on December 10, 1864, the very day on or about which, according to all the evidence, the contract upon which this claim is founded was made, General Thomas, commanding the department, issued an order directing the troops to supply themselves with fuel, so far as practicable, from the woods and forests adjacent to their encampments. In the opinion of your committee this order clearly shows that a public exigency then existed, such as under the provisions of the act of June 2, 1862, authorized the commanding officer to order the chief quartermaster to procure supplies in the most expeditious manner without advertising.

"When this case was before Quartermaster-General Meigs he wrote concerning it:

"'I ought to remark that after reading the testimony of Mills, late captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers at Nashville, I am of the opinion that the state of affairs to which he testifies in the Henderson suit do show an exigency which was sufficient to justify the commanding officer to dispense with written contracts under the law.

* * * * * * *

"'I have the impression that some competent authority (Secretary of War, General Sherman, or General Thomas) did issue an order to the chief quartermaster, General Donaldson, intended to authorize under the law the more rapid method of verbal or open purchases in all cases of necessity.'

"But the order which General Meigs stated his impression had been issued was not then found, and hence the claim was rejected, as the public exigency which would justify a verbal contract did not seem to have existed. Had attention been then called to the existence of that order, the contract between Stewart and George B. Hibbard, captain and assistant quartermaster, would have been recognized as coming fairly within the exception as to written contracts stated in Army Regulations, paragraph 1048, which is the precise language of 22 Statutes at Large, page 220, and is as follows:

"'When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the article or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract at the place and in the mode in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals.'

"Prior to the presentation of this claim to the Quartermaster-General a claim of one R. J. Henderson, for damages for violation of a verbal contract to deliver wood at the same point and the same time, had been presented and disallowed, upon the ground that the contract was not in writing, as required by the act of June 2, 1862. The War Department and the Committee on Claims of the Senate, in the Forty-fourth Congress, when disallowing the claim of the administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, declare it and the claim of R. J. Henderson to be 'precisely similar,' and correctly so declare.

"Yet the same committee, at a later period of the same session, during which they reported adversely on the claim of Michael S. Stewart's administratrix, being called upon to pass upon the claim of R. J. Henderson (the order of General Thomas, of December 10, 1864, having been in the mean time brought to their notice), reported favorably upon the petition of R. J. Henderson, recommending an appropriation to pay him the full amount of his claim, and both Houses of Congress passed a bill for his relief, which was approved by the President.

"If the said Michael S. Stewart had made a written contract, there could have been no doubt or question as to the liability of the Government to pay his administratrix the balance she now claims; and even if it be conceded that Assistant Quartermaster Hibbard had not authority to make a verbal contract with Stewart which would be binding upon the Government, it is clear that M. S. Stewart did not know that it was his duty or business to ascertain whether Captain Hibbard was acting in excess of his authority, and that the circumstances of the case were such as to justify him in believing that Captain Hibbard was acting within his authority. Stewart's administratrix would, therefore, upon equitable principles, have a strong claim upon the Government to be reimbursed by the payment of the balance of the contract price for expenses incurred by her intestate on its behalf, unless by some misconduct her right to have her claim equitably considered has been forfeited.

"The Committee on Claims of the Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress were of the opinion that the petitioner was not entitled to have her claim considered upon equitable principles for these reasons, all of which we have carefully re-examined, and find to be unfounded:

"First. Because the affidavit of the contractor, made March 29, 1866, and filed in the Quartermaster-General's Department, in support of his claim, 'leaves the impression that all said wood was remaining on the banks of the Cumberland River at that date.'

"The testimony makes it entirely clear that at the time the affidavit of March 29, 1866, was made, and until the month of September following, all said wood remained undisposed of upon the banks of said river except 60 cords thereof, which were in the woods near by. It seems also clear, from the dates of the numerous affidavits accompanying the petitioner's claim, that the papers in the case were transmitted to Washington, to the contractor's original attorney, on or about July 10, 1866. They were not actually filed in the Quartermaster's Department until early in October of that year, but it seems but fair to attribute the delay to the neglect of the attorney, whose written argument, filed in the Quartermaster-General's Department, on behalf of this claim, shows him to be so careless that he repeatedly misstates the name of his client.

"Second. Because no reference is made in the original petition presented by the contractor's administratrix to the Senate on January 6, 1874, 'to any sale, or attempted sale, or other disposition whatever, by M. S. Stewart, or his administratrix, of any part of the 903 cords of wood.'

"The petitioner explains, under oath, that she knew very little about business, and nothing about the condition of this case, and left the matter of preparing her petition to her attorney, not intending to withhold any fact in connection with the wood or the subsequent disposition of it. This statement is fully borne out by the fact that the petition is signed, not in the petitioner's handwriting, but in that of her attorney, and that it requests that the papers on file in the Quartermaster-General's Office relating to the claim may be examined and considered in its support.

"As the petition thus expressly called attention to the existence and whereabouts of the papers which showed the disposition of the wood, and asked that those papers might be examined and considered by Congress as the evidence upon which the petitioner rested her claim, it is unreasonable to conclude that the petitioner was attempting to conceal from Congress a fact which an examination of those papers could not fail to disclose.

"We prefer rather to adopt the more natural conclusion that the failure of the original petition to mention the fact that the contractor had relieved himself of part of his loss by a sale of the wood was not set out in the petition, because it was unknown to the petitioner, and to her attorney, whose connection with the case only began after the death of the petitioner's husband (the original claimant), and of his attorney, who had presented the case to the Department.

"Third. Because, after the contractor received notice from the acting assistant quartermaster that no more wood would be taken under the contract, he held on to the 903 cords in the hope of obtaining large damages from the Government, when, if he had been so disposed, he could have sold it to wood-dealers at much more than the price at which he had contracted to sell it to the Government.

"There is nothing in the case except the entirely gratuitous suggestion of Acting Assistant Quartermaster Moore, to whom the case was referred by the Quartermaster's Department for investigation, to indicate that the contractor, after the Government's refusal to take it, held on to the wood in the hope of obtaining large damages from the Government. On the contrary, he did not, in his original affidavits setting forth his claim, even ask to be paid the contract price. His claim was that, as a citizen who had at all times displayed unswerving fidelity and loyalty to the Government, and who had risked his stock in carrying out faithfully and energetically his contract with Captain Hibbard and his successors, he should be paid the actual expense incurred by him in cutting said wood and getting it ready for delivery in accordance with his contract, which expense he stated was $4,946.70, which was $471.30 less than the contract price.

"Nor is there anything in the case, except the suggestion of said Acting Quartermaster Moore, to indicate that the contractor could, if he had been so disposed, have sold the wood after the Government's refusal to accept it for much more than, or for as much as, the price at which he had contracted to sell it to the Government. The evidence in the case is that, between the time when the demand for wood for the use of the Army had ceased and the time when the contractor succeeded in disposing of said wood for $2.50 a cord, there was no time when he could have realized a higher sum for it, where it was, upon the bank of the river, than that for which he sold it. Indeed, it is impossible to suppose that a Government contractor could have been so ignorant as not to know that the largest sum he could hope to receive in payment of supplies which the Government had refused to receive was the full contract price; and with this knowledge it is impossible to believe that when the Government, by canceling its contract with him, relieved him from his obligation to discharge his part of it, he would have failed to dispose of the supplies thus thrown upon his hands if the opportunity to do so at more than the contract price had been presented to him.

"We think, therefore, that a more thorough and careful examination of the facts of the case shows that the Senate Committee on Claims in the Forty-fourth Congress was wrong in treating this as a case in which the petitioner, by reason of improper conduct, had forfeited all claim to have the equities of her case considered by Congress.

"Your committee are of the opinion that the agreement between Captain Hibbard and the petitioner's intestate was made at a time when an urgent necessity existed for wood for the use of the Army; and that as the proof sustains the delivery of the wood to the proper military authorities, they are further of the opinion that the Government is in duty baund to pay to the petitioner the difference between the contract price and the sum realised by a resale of the wood.

They accordingly report the accompanying bill, appropriating the sum of $3,160.50, and recommend its passage."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Unless some gentleman of the House desires further information in addition to what has been given by the reading of the report I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation

Mr. STEELE. I shall object to that. I see that this claim was considered by a committee of the Forty-fourth Congress and they decided against it. Prior to that the Quartermaster-General thoroughly investigated this case, having the means at his disposal to do so, and he decided against it. An appeal was taken to the Secretary of War and he decided that it had no merit.

By the showing of the report, for 10,000 cords of wood this man was allowed $3.50 a cord more than wood could be sold to anybody else. The Government paid $3.50 per cord more than the market price; and now, twenty years after the war, this claimant comes and renews the claim upon the affidavit of a man who says he made a verbal contract, when it is not reasonable to suppose that a contract of such magnitude existed, and if it did the quartermaster's returns ought to show something about this matter. But the Quartermaster's Department says there is nothing on file in the Department to show the claim is just. On the contrary, they say unequivocally there is no merit in the case; and, as I said before, the committee of the Forty-fourth Congress said there was no merit in it. And now we are asked to say the committee of the Forty-fourth Congress was wrong, the Quartermaster-General was wrong, the Secretary of War was wrong, and there is merit in the case.

I have not before me a copy of the report. I sent to the document-room, but was unable to get one. But I can see that enough has been said by the committee of the former Congress, by the Quartermaster-General, and by the Secretary of War to show conclusively there is no merit in the claim; and I hope the committee will not lay the bill aside to be reported with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this bill ought to have some more consideration than is implied in the motion to lay it aside for a favorable recommendation. If gentlemen will look at the report in this case they will see that according to the records in the office of the Quartermaster-General, it appears that this case was presented to the Quartermaster-General in 1866 for consideration under what is known as the 4th of July act; that the Quartermaster-General took jurisdiction of it under that act and adjudicated it; and that after a thorough investigation the claim was disallowed by the Quartermaster-General in toto. Then an appeal was taken to the Judge-Advocate-General, who, after examination of the papers, approved the action of the Quartermaster-General.

In seems that this rejection of the case was upon, first, a technical ground, that there was no written contract; and, secondly, upon the ground that the claim was without merit. So that it did not lose its rightful consideration before the Quartermaster-General upon the mere technicality of the want of a written contract, but that department examined it upon its merits and decided that it had no merit. It was also considered by the Senate committee in the Forty-fourth Congress, and by that committee also was rejected on its merits. I fail to see from this report how the case is placed in a better light by subsequent testimony than that in which it stood upon the testimony before the Quartermaster-General and before the Senate committee in the Forty-fourth Congress. On general principles, it seems that after Congress has provided a tribunal in one of the Departments for hearing, considering, and determining claims against the Government, and after that tribunal has taken cognizance of a case and has heard and determined it upon its merits, that decision ought to be a finality, and the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States should not constitute themselves a high court of appeal to which cases adjudicated by the Departments and the courts established by the Government should be brought, by special act, for review and overruling of the decisions of those tribunals. For these reasons it seems to me that this case should receive very careful consideration before it should be allowed to pass. I would like to have some friend of the bill give reasons, first, why Congress should take jurisdiction of this case after it has been rejected by the tribunal created for the consideration of such cases; and, secondly, if Congress should take jurisdiction, what newly-discovered evidence has been brought into the record which goes to show that the tribunal below erred and that the party had, in fact, a right to recover. Until these questions are satisfactorily answered I can not give my support to this bill.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall be very glad to have it answered.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman inquires why Congress is asked to take jurisdiction of this case after it has been disposed of by the Quartermaster-General? I suppose it is upon the same principle on which Congress takes jurisdiction of the Fitz-John Porter case. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand that the Quartermaster-General has disposed of the Fitz-John Porter case.

Mr. HOUK. But a military court, a higher tribunal, did dispose of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee but a few moments in presenting this case. We have had occasion to examine it very carefully, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has stated but a portion of the facts. A committee of the Senate at one time did report adversely to this claim. We found also that the Quartermaster-General did, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], reject the claim. But, Mr. Chairman, the main ground alleged for that action is that the contract made with the claimant for the delivery of this wood in 1864 by the assistant quartermaster at Nashville was not in writing, but was merely verbal. The committee which reported adversely to the claim seemed to be under the impression that under the act of June 2, 1862, unless the contract for the delivery of the wood was in writing, the claim could not be allowed. Now I think the better reason is given by the Senate committee afterward when it came to consider the case. The committee of the present House, in reporting this case, has adopted the report of the Senate committee, made by Senator DOLPH, and in that report we find that he copies from the act of 1862 the tenth section, in which it is provided that when supplies of this kind are needed for the Army for immediate delivery, or where the performance of the work is required by a public exigency, then the contract need not be in writing. So the Senate committee found in this case there was no necessity for a contract in writing; that a public exigency did exist at that time, in the winter of 1864, at Nashville, for the immediate delivery of this wood for hospital purposes and the supply of the Army, and that therefore a verbal contract was made with this man to deliver this wood at some point on the bank of the Cumberland River within 25 miles of the city of Nashville. The wood was delivered according to the verbal contract. There is no controversy upon that point. But, the exigency having passed away before it was all delivered, the Government did not see fit to pay according to the terms of the contract for what had been delivered upon the bank of the river.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to ask him a question. It appears this contractor was paying the exorbitant sum of $1.75 for this wood, according to his own statement. Now, if he had had 100,000 cords of wood cut and lying there on the bank of the river, does the gentleman think that the Government would have been under obligation to take all that wood at $6 a cord when it was worth only $2.50 a cord in the market?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; but that is not the report of this committee. If there was a public exigency demanding that amount of wood, and the Government made a contract for that amount at that price, I imagine it would be bound to take it.

Mr. STEELE. But the Government did take all the wood which it had need for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the Government in this case contracted for 10,000 cords of wood to be delivered immediately, or at an early day, on the bank of the Cumberland River.

Mr. HOUK. Can the gentleman inform us how much was delivered?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Two thousand cords, and that was paid for. Afterward the contractor delivered 843 cords and corded it up according to contract on the bank of the river.

Mr. HOUK. At the place provided in the contract?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir. Now we are not asking pay for this claimant at the rate of $6 a cord.

Mr. HOUK. One other question. At what rate does the committee recommend that this man be paid?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We recommend he be paid exactly what it cost him to put the wood there; that is all.

Mr. HOUK. How much?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Thirty-one hundred and sixty dollars. I can not, at this moment, say how much that is per cord.

Mr. HOUK. I do not wish the gentleman to misunderstand me. I want to vote for this bill if it is right; I merely wish to know whether it is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And I do not wish the gentleman to vote for it unless he believes it to be right. I would not do so myself. I can not state the exact price per cord that we propose to allow, unless I should sit down and make the calculation; but we propose to pay this man just what it cost him to put that wood at the place where the officers of the United States had agreed to accept it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What became of the 800 cords of wood?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state that in a moment. When the officers of the United States refused to accept the wood this man went forward and sold it at $2.50 a cord. Now the committee, in finding the amount due, deduct the amount thus received at the lower price and allow only the difference between the price thus realized and the contract price at which the officers of the Government had agced to take the wood.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then this allowance relates only to the quantity of wood actually delivered on the banks of the river?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; after crediting him with the amount he received for the wood he sold.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And there is no sum included for damages by reason of the failure on the part of the Government to take the wood?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir, not at all. We propose to allow just what it is proved he had to pay to have this wood cut, and hauled, and corded on the bank of the river. There is no speculation of any kind in this matter.

Mr. MILLARD. When was this claim heard by the quartermaster—about what time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. About 1869, if I remember correctly.

Mr. MILLARD. Was it heard on its merits?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That does not appear. The report simply shows that he considered the claim and could not allow it under the 4th of July act.

Mr. MILLARD. Was the claimant permitted to be heard by the quartermaster?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report states:

From the records of the Quartermaster-General it appears that on the 8th of October, 1886, the contractor, M. S. Stewart, presented to the Department his claim for $4,946.70, being, as was alleged, the actual expense incurred in purchasing and preparing for delivery 903 cords of wood.

Mr. MILLARD. Was that prior to the hearing before the Senate committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was heard before the Senate committee afterward.

Mr. MILLARD. And disallowed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The report of one committee was in favor of disallowing the claim, but at the next session the question was reconsidered and action was taken in favor of allowing the claim. In the last Congress the claim was considered by the House Committee on War Claims and again allowed, and at the same session it was allowed by the Senate committee.

Mr. STEELE. Has the quartermaster's agent ever investigated this claim?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know; I can not answer that question. The proof on file, however, shows conclusively that this was the proper amount.

Mr. STEELE. Of what does the proof on file, showing that this wood was actually delivered, consist?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There has never been any controversy on that point in either committee. Affidavits on file show conclusively that this amount was delivered. The quartermasters themselves—two of them—agree that this wood was delivered under the contract. Their letters or testimony will be found in the report, in which they say that this wood was delivered according to the contract.

Mr. STEELE. Two ex-quartermasters?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. WOLFORD. I want to understand the facts. There was a contract made in this case with the proper authority for the delivery of a certain quantity of wood?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. And upon the faith of that contract it was delivered at the place agreed on?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. And not received?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir. A part of it was received; but the war closed, and the officers of the United States did not receive the balance.

Mr. WOLFORD. And the contractor had to sell the wood afterward for what he could get?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. And the war having closed, he had to sell at a reduced price?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir. Now, Mr. Chairman, the proof shows that this man was a loyal citizen of the United States; that he furnished his own teams; that he agreed to deliver this wood to the Army authorities at Nashville when there was a public exigency, when there was a great demand for it; that he complied with this contract. The proof is that the price at which he was to deliver the wood was then reasonable and fair; that this contractor did all he was required to do; and after the close of the war he sold the wood for what he could get for it. The Government is now asked to pay to his estate merely the difference between the contract price and that at which he was obliged to sell the wood.

Mr. STEELE. I do not wish to disturb the gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is no disturbance; I am glad to give the gentleman any information I can.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to inquire whether the present Quartermaster-General has been consulted about this account.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not answer that question. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes of my time to my colleague from Nashville [Mr. CALDWELL], who is the immediate representative of the parties interested in this case.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will state in the first place, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is mistaken in supposing this claim was ever disallowed on its merits. The only reason why it was ever disallowed was on account of the fact there was not a written contract; that the order of General Thomas, showing the existence of a public exigency to justify the verbal agreement under Army Regulations, had not been made to appear. As a matter of course, if there had been a written contract with Stewart for the delivery of this wood, there would have been no controversy if he had performed his part of the contract. But the question arose simply as to whether the quartermaster's memorandum, made at the time, showing stipulations of the amount of wood to be delivered and the terms upon which it was to be delivered, was such an agreement as to bring it within the obligations of a written contract. It was decided that it would put it outside because of the absence of proof of the order of General Thomas of 10th of December, 1864. Now, according to the evidence, the agreement on which this claim was founded was made under the order of General Thomas, who commanded the department, that the troops should provide themselves with fuel as far as practicable. That order showed there was such a public exigency existing at the time, which, under the act of June, 1862, authorized the commanding officer to procure supplies of fuel in the most expeditious manner, and without advertising. The report says:

In this case it was insisted before the War Department and before the committee, when they formerly considered it, that Captain Hibbard had a right to make a verbal contract or parol agreement, from the fact that the public exigency which creates the exception in the act quoted existed. This, however, was a matter to be determined from all the circumstances surrounding the case, and the War Department and the Senate Committee on Claims in the Forty-fourth Congress decided, upon the facts then brought to their notice, that the public exigency creating the exception in the act quoted did not exist.

But since then the fact, which was overlooked when this claim was formerly under consideration, has been brought to the attention of this committee, that on December 10, 1864, the very day on or about which, according to all the evidence, the contract upon which this claim is founded was made, General Thomas, commanding the department, issued an order directing the troops to supply themselves with fuel, so far as practicable, from the woods and forests adjacent to their encampments. In the opinion of your committee, this order clearly shows that a public exigency then existed, such as under the provisions of the act of June 2, 1862, authorized the commanding officer to order the chief quartermaster to procure supplies in the most expeditious manner without advertising.

When this case was before Quartermaster-General Meigs he wrote concerning it:

"I ought to remark that, after reading the testimony of Mills, late captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers at Nashville, I am of the opinion that the state of affairs to which he testifies in the Henderson suit do show an exigency which was sufficient to justify the commanding officer to dispense with written contracts under the law.

* * * * * * * *

"I have the impression that some competent authority, Secretary of War, General Sherman, or General Thomas, did issue an order to the chief quartermaster, General Donaldson, intended to authorize under the law the more rapid method of verbal or open purchases in all cases of necessity.'

"But the order which General Meigs stated his impression had been issued was not then found, and hence the claim was rejected, as the public exigency which would justify a verbal contract did not seem to have existed. Had attention been then called to the existence of that order, the contract between Stewart and George B. Hibbard, captain and assistant quartermaster, would have been recognized as coming fairly within the exception as to written contracts stated in Army Regulations, paragraph 1048, which is the precise language of 22 Statutes at Large, page 220, and is as follows:

"'When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the article or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract at the place and in the mode in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals.'

Now, what does he mean by the Henderson suit?

"Prior to the presentation of this claim to the Quartermaster-General a claim of one R. J. Henderson, for damages for violation of a verbal contract to deliver wood at the same point and at the same time, had been presented and disallowed, upon the ground that the contract was not in writing as required by the act of June 2, 1862. The War Department and the Committee on Claims of the Senate, in the Forty-fourth Congress, when disallowing the claim of the administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, declare it and the claim of R. J. Henderson to be 'precisely similar,' and correctly so declare.

Yet the same committee at a later period of the same session, during which they reported adversely on the claim of Michael S. Stewart's administratrix, being called upon to pass upon the claim of R. J. Henderson (the order of General Thomas, of December 10, 1864, having been in the mean time brought to their notice), reported favorably upon the petition of R. J. Henderson, recommending an appropriation to pay him the full amount of his claim, and both Houses of Congress passed a bill for his relief, which was approved by the President.

Mr. STEELE. The report then was that this Stewart claim was without merit?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; both claims went off on the same proposition. The public exigency was made to appear for the first time under the order of General Thomas of the 10th of December, 1864. The confederate army was in his immediate front. Nashville was then in an actual state of siege. It was made for the first time to appear there really did exist a public exigency which justified a verbal agreement on the part of the Government with this party to furnish these supplies. This claim was disallowed, as Henderson's was in the first instance, solely on the ground of failure to make the public exigency appear. It was made to appear by the production of the order of General Thomas of the 10th of December, 1864, and when produced, and when the public exigency was made to appear, the Quartermaster-General himself said the claim was a just one and should be paid.

Mr. STEELE. Have you any testimony as to the opinion of the present Quartermaster-General?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have none except as appears by the papers on file with the pending report. But I do not know what the opinion of the present Quartermaster-General has to do with this matter.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to know what he says on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, the inclination of my mind is against all claims of this character, and if it had not been for the fact that I had carefully investigated this particular claim in the last Congress possibly I would now be prejudiced against it. But after full and careful investigation my mind could reach no other conclusion than that reported by the committee of this Congress, to the same conclusion reached by the Senate committee in the Forty-eighth Congress, and to the same conclusion reached by the committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, that this claim was a just one and ought to be allowed.

Now, it is well known that the Quartermaster-General's Department examines all these cases carefully, and that where the letter of the law does not warrant the allowance of a claim the uniform practice has been to reject it. It is true they often accompany their disallowance of a claim by referring the claimant to Congress for relief by legislation.

The rejection of this claim was upon the narrow and technical ground that it was prohibited under the statute which required all contracts for commissary and quartermaster supplies to be in writing. I take it the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from Illinois will not say this Government should refuse to pay on the mere technical ground that the contract with the Government was not in writing, when in all other respects it was faithfully fulfilled on the part of the claimant. No gentleman in this House would attempt to place this Government on any such principle as that, if the claim were otherwise honest and equitable.

The fact is, the only adverse report outside of the Quartermaster-General's Department was that of the Senate committee in the Forty-fourth Congress, and that adverse report was based upon two or three circumstances which have since been fully explained and shown to be erroneous. One was, as I recollect, that the claimant when he filed his claim stated or left the impression there were 903 cords of wood on the banks of the river at the time, when in point of fact sixty or more cords had been sold or removed. They discovered on examining all the papers that while they were dated in March, 1866, they had not been actually filed until October, 1866, and in the mean time this wood had been removed. It was alleged therefore the claimant had misstated the facts, and it was held the claim presented was dishonest.

Another objection was, as I remember, that nothing was said of an attempted sale some time in 1864 or 1865. This was explained in this way, that in the mean time this man Stewart had died, and, as I remember, the attorney who prosecuted this claim before the Quartermaster's Department also died, leaving this widow alone, without any counsel, to prepare her case, which was done in ignorance of essential facts which otherwise would have appeared in the statement.

The committee, on that ground, made the adverse report. Subsequent investigation, as I have already said, showed that they were entirely mistaken in this respect, entirely so in one case, and that the other was a mistake of a woman who was deprived of counsel in getting up the claim.

Upon every principle in which I have looked at the case this party is certainly entitled to the amount reported by the committee here, and I do not see how the House can refuse to allow it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. PETTIBONE.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is a well-understood principle always that allegiance and protection go together; that this House ought not to undertake, and this Government ought not, to pay to anybody who was then attempting to destroy it for supplies taken for the use of the Government. But I understand it is not controverted here that in this case Mr. Stewart, whose administratrix comes here and asks the payment of this claim, was a loyal man. The chief objection, as I understand it, is that there was no written contract at the time. On this subject Chief Quartermaster Meigs has said:

I ought to remark that after reading the testimony of Mills, late captain and assistant quartermaster at Nashville, I am of the opinion that the state of affairs to which he testified is such as shows an exigency which was sufficient to justify the commanding officer to dispense with a written contract under the law.

Now, what was that exigency? Why, this was done on the 10th day of December, 1864. What was the condition then? The army of General Hood had swept up across the Tennessee River and was thundering at the very gates of Nashville. It was a time when I know, and there are scores of gentlemen on this floor who were down there who will recollect, that the winter was an exceptionally severe one; the weather was extremely inclement, and the ground was one mass of ice. Here was the wood; it had to be immediately delivered, and here was the army in urgent need of it.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask my friend from Tennessee if it was not warm enough down there part of the time without any wood?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Oh, after the fighting began, my dear fellow, it was warm enough. [Laughter.] It was hot when the armies met. But such cold weather as then prevailed was not theretofore known, as I recollect, and not within the recollection of my comrade and colleague, for many years. Our men were shivering, without even the poor dog-tents of that time to cover us. Under these circumstances the wood was cut, delivered, and in part paid for. It appears that there were 843 cords——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Eight hundred and sixty-three.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Well, that is immaterial; it was something between 800 and 900 cords of wood which had been cut by this contractor, had been brought up and delivered, being piled up on the river bank. Now he had done what he could and had been at great expense in complying with his contract. When the war was over, and it closed shortly thereafter, the wood was on his hands, and he sold it for the best price he could get and then found that he was out of pocket $3,160.50. If he had never made a contract with the Government he would not have been out of that money. Now, whose loss should it be? Here is a loyal man making a contract with the Government, faithfully, so far as he could, performing his part of the contract; spending money out of his own pocket to perform his contract; when the war was over, happily for us all, the Government did not need it, and his administratrix now seeks to obtain from the Government the difference between what the wood actually cost him and the amount at which he was compelled to sell it The course suggested by the committee it seems to me is wise, that the bill be laid aside, and when we reach it in due time debate it fully, and if the facts are not clear and convincing do not vote a penny of it; but if the facts are as stated here, and they are not disputed, then in honor's name pay every dollar that we find due him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. GEDDES].

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I ought to say a word in regard to this claim. We ought to get before our minds a few facts that are undisputed, admitted on all hands, and then meet in a proper spirit disputed questions and settle them accordingly. Here was a loyal citizen, admittedly loyal, who made a contract with the quartermaster for the delivery of a quantity of wood. That the contract was made is an admitted fact; that it was made at a time when the Government needed the wood is conceded; that the exigencies surrounding the parties at the time made it exceedingly important that the wood should be delivered at once and under the most difficult circumstances is not questioned; that the wood was actually delivered in pursuance of this contract, made with the assistant quartermaster of this Government, is also an admitted fact.

After the delivery of this wood, and when the exigency was removed and it was not needed by the Government, then the party is notified that his wood is not wanted. But the expense had been incurred, the labor had been performed, the wood had been cut, had been hauled, and delivered on the banks of the Cumberland River, at the instance and the command and under a verbal contract made by a quartermaster of the Government of the United States.

These are admitted facts. Now, when the Government did not need it, and they felt called upon to so notify the party, he did all that an honorable citizen could be expected to do; he went out into the market and, as every man knows, would seek to resell the wood at the highest price it could be sold for under the change of circumstances; and he did sell it at $2.50 a cord; and now he comes and asks for the difference between the actual cost, the money paid out for this wood and for its actual delivery there on the banks of the river for the Government—the difference between that and the resale. What objection is there to this payment? I can see there are technical legal objections such as the Quartermaster-General would act upon, such as under his oath of office he is required to act upon, and such as he did act upon. But nowhere in this report does he say that he regarded the claim as inequitable; and the facts show that it is an equitable claim, and that is why this party appeals to Congress instead of to the courts or to the Quartermaster's Department. The claim was rejected solely because no law existed authorizing the payment of it by the Quartermaster's Department. But now these being the admitted facts, this claim being of the nature I have stated, I submit that it is equitable and just that the claimant should be compensated for the actual expenditure made twenty years ago without interest and when he has waited all this length of time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. I, for one, can not conceive how a great government like ours can plead either limitation or the technical consideration that there ought to have been a contract in writing. The only question that presents itself to my mind is a question of fair play and honesty. Did the contractor deliver the wood? The question did the Government need the wood is a secondary consideration. But with General Hood in our front with a great army of our brothers who were determined to fight and always did fight—that is my experience of them—when you came across them, with such a force as that, there was a necessity for the wood.

Nobody I suppose has forgotten, and I certainly did not forget, for I was in the field, that cold winter of 1864. I remember well how extremely cold it was and how we needed wood everywhere.

It is true that General Jones once warmed me up on a cold day when I felt gone for the time being, but as a general rule it was the coldest winter I ever experienced, this one not excepted. The cold was felt sensibly by our soldiers everywhere. That ablest and best of our generals, the immortal Thomas, gave the order for this fuel. A contract was made. I do not care whether it was in writing or not. Surely upon such a ground as that this great Government will not deny to any of its citizens with whom it has made a contract the poor sum of $3,160. Nobody would plead the technicality of the law in such a case as that. An individual who would buy that amount of wood or bacon or flour or anything else and undertake to plead the statute of writing upon it, though he might have a case technically in a court of justice, would be hooted at by every honest man in the world. Righteousness exalteth a nation, and sin is a reproach to any people. We have no right to stand here as the Congress of the United States, the highest political body in the world, with sovereign rights and power—no right to plead what an individual would degrade himself by doing.

This man cut the wood and delivered it. Peace then came. I remember well when that word "peace" passed through the country how the hearts of the soldiers rejoiced, how the hearts of the citizens rejoiced. If the question had been raised at that time, "Shall we stop to consume that wood?" any one who suggested such a thing would have been laughed at. What was this amount of $3,160 in comparison with the blessings of peace? For the sake of peace the country would have let millions upon millions be abandoned if that had been necessary. But our first contracts should be paid when peace was restored for the honor and glory of a united people standing again upon the old foundation of our fathers. We ought to be willing to pay any amount of money that was justly due when peace was restored, and the whole country, reunited and knitted together again, entered once more on a career of prosperity.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. HOUK. I rise simply to state what I believe to be the facts. I understand this claim originated in a contract to deliver so many thousand cords of wood at $6 a cord at a certain point. Two thousand cords were delivered and paid for under the contract; 800 and more, I think 843 cords, were delivered, and the Government failed to receive it. Consequently the contractor had to look out and dispose of his cord-wood thus left on his hands in some other way or lose it altogether. Accordingly he sold it for $2.50 a cord. Now he comes here and does not ask to be paid the full contract price. He might have done so, and I think we would have felt bound to comply with the obligations of the contract if he had asked it; but he simply asks that the Government shall pay him the difference between what he realized and what it cost him to deliver the wood at the place where the Government agreed to receive it; and it does seem to me that the case is too clear for controversy or for prolonged discussion.

While I have the floor, however (and sometimes it is a sort of a luxury to get it), I want to say this, that the treatment by the Government, through Congress, of the people of the border States in regard to what is justly due them is absolutely mean and outrageous. There are thousands of just claims which now probably will never be paid that would have been paid long ago if they had arisen on the other side of the line.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is acted upon, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on War Claims [Mr. GEDDES], and also of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who has spoken upon this bill, to the fact that this claim was not presented to the Quartermaster-General's Department under what is known as the 4th of July law. I call attention to that fact for the reason that, up to this time, I am not aware that any bill has been reported to Congress for the payment of a claim which has been adjusted or disallowed under the act of July 4, 1864, and I think it important to preserve the distinction between cases adjudicated under that law and other cases for this reason: The Quartermaster's Department, in dealing with cases under the law of July 4, 1864, acts upon an entirely different rule from that which governs it in dealing with the general current business of the department. By the law of July 4, 1864, the Quartermaster-General was invested with special powers to inquire into the facts at the place where the transaction occurred, and therefore, in adjudicating claims coming before it under that law, the department acts as a judicial tribunal, so to speak, as nearly so as any department of the Army can. In investigating cases coming to it under the 4th of July act, the department seeks to ascertain all the facts both for and against the Government. Under the law such claims go from the Quartermaster to the Third Auditor, and thence to the Second Comptroller for further examination. But this claim came before the Quartermaster in the current business of that department, and went from there to the Secretary of War on appeal, so to speak, and was referred to the Judge-Advocate-General. These facts show that the adjudication of this case was not made under the act of July 4, 1864, but merely as a part of the current administration of the Quartermaster's Office, and necessarily without a thorough investigation of all the facts.

I think, therefore, that a broad distinction should be made between this claim and any claim which has been passed upon by the department under the 4th of July act, and that Congress should apply a very different rule to this or to any case arising in the current administration of the Quartermaster's Department from that which it applies to a case which has received an actual adjudication under the very ample powers which, by the act of July 4, 1864, were conferred upon the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I assumed that this case went to the Quartermaster's Department under the 4th of July act, from the fact that that act was passed on July 4, 1864, and this claim was not presented to the Quartermaster's Department until 1866. For that reason I had a right to assume that the claim went there under the law which was then in existence, and I wish the gentleman would explain, if he can, why it did not go to the department under that law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason is this: It appears from the face of this report that the case went to the Secretary of War. Now, under the act of July 4, 1864, a claim can not go to the Secretary of War, because it must go directly from the Quartermaster-General to the Third Auditor. In the next place, under the 4th of July act, the question whether the contract was in writing or not would be unimportant, while here the case is made to turn on the question whether there was a written contract or not. If my friend [Mr. SPRINGER] will turn to the act of July 4, 1864 (which I have before me), he will see that there is necessarily a broad distinction between the adjudication of a claim by the Quartermaster-General under that act and the adjudication of a claim as a part of the current business of the department. The law of July 4, 1864, was intended to meet an entirely different class of cases from those which arise in the current business, and that law became necessary from the fact that a great multitude of peculiar cases did arise outside of the regular routine of the department.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was not this claim cognizable under the act of July 4, 1864, and why should it not be considered under that law which was then in force? Further, it seems that the cause of action here accrued in 1864, yet the claim was not presented until October, 1866. Therefore it was not current business; it did not come under the provisions for the current expenses of the Government during the fiscal year, nor does it appear that there was any appropriation made which would cover a case of this kind. Why, then, was it that, the law of 1864 being in force, this case got into the department under some other law?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy time in the discussion of this bill, but I will ask to have the second section of the act of July 4, 1864, read. I am sure that my friend [Mr. SPRINGER] will see the distinction between the two classes of cases. Besides, he will remember that it was some time after 1866 before the Quartermaster-General was invested with the very general powers which he now possesses and under which he employs a large number of agents who are commissioned to take testimony. They do investigate the facts both for and against the Government, and it is upon the facts thus obtained that the judgment of the Quartermaster-General in cases of this kind is predicated. On the other hand, in passing upon a claim occurring in the regular course of the operations of the War Department, the Quartermaster-General acts only through the agencies created by the general provisions of law.

Another fact has just been suggested to me which is more important as an answer to the inquiry of my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. That is, that the original act of 1864 did not apply to the State of Tennessee. It applied only to the States which were not in rebellion. Afterward—I can not at this moment say how long afterward—it was extended, as the gentleman will remember, to the State of West Virginia and also to the State of Tennessee.

I wish to have read now the section to which I have referred, so that it may go into this debate, for I am very anxious that the dictinction should be very clearly marked as to the vast number of claims adjudicated by the Quartermaster's Department, which it seems to me ought to stand upon their own footing.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all claims of loyal citizens in States not in rebellion for quartermaster's stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States and receipted for by the proper officer receiving the same, or which may have been taken by such officers without giving such receipt, may be submitted to the Quartermaster-General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as each claimant can present on the facts in his case; and it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster-General to cause such claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and of the loyalty of the claimant, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of and used by said Army, then to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, with a recommendation for settlement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3830) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Joseph W. Parish, late of Peoria, Ill., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $58,341.85, being the balance of money laid out and expended by him in the purchase of 17,232 tons of ice for the use and at the request of the Government of the United States, which were not afterward called for or taken by the Government, but were wholly lost to said Parish.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, since this bill was reported by the House committee a bill in exactly the same terms has passed the Senate, has been referred to the Committee on War Claims of this House, and has been reported back with a recommendation that it pass. I move, therefore, that Senate bill 241 be substituted for the bill now under consideration, and that it be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In order that we may understand the matter in controversy in this case I would like to have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be read in the time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] without his consent. It may be read in the time of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LYMAN. I have no objection to the reading of the report. But I ask that before the reading the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill. The two bills are exactly alike in their terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana desired to have the report read with the view of determining whether or not he would consent to the request of the gentleman from Iowa that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. Does the gentleman from Indiana ask for the reading of the report before that question is put?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have no objection to the Senate bill being read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] requested further that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Joseph W. Parish, late of Peoria, Ill., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $58,341.85, being the balance of money laid out and expended by him in the purchase of 17,232 tons of ice for the use and at the request of the Government of the United States, which were not afterward called for or taken by the Government but were wholly lost to said Parish.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to ask for the reading of the report.

A portion of the report (by Mr. LYMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph W. Parish, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on Claims, No. 1956, second session Forty-seventh Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report herewith a bill appropriating the sum of $58,341.85, with the recommendation that it do pass.

[House Report No. 1956, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition and bill (H. R. 2463) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report as the result of their deliberations thereon:

The appeal which the claimant makes to Congress for relief is decidedly sui generis, and stands alone in the peculiarity of its facts. It had its origin in an ice contract made with the Government in March, 1863, and an alleged failure on the part of the Government to fulfill its stipulations, whereby a great loss was sustained by the claimant. By a special act of Congress this matter of controversy was directed to be settled by suit before the United States Court of Claims. The gist of the controversy consisted in the Government refusing to receive more than 12,768 tons out of the 30,000 tons which had been ordered by the Government and purchased by claimant, leaving 17,232 tons to waste on his hands, for which no requisition was ever made. For this 17,232 tons suit was brought to recover the contract price less the cost of delivery. In support of this action a large amount of testimony was taken, but the issues did not involve the original cost price of the ice; hence the evidence in relation thereto was incidental and more or less vague and uncertain.

On the hearing of the cause, the Court of Claims dismissed the suit on technical grounds, namely, that the assistant surgeon-general, Colonel Wood, at Saint Louis, had not the power or authority to make a requisition for 30,000 tons of ice under the contract. This decision was reversed on an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but in doing so that court changed the claimant's cause of action, and held that he was only entitled to recover back the money he had expended in the purchase of the ice, and the cost of purchasing and taking care of the same accordingly. As the evidence had been taken on another theory of the case, the Supreme Court, in its mandate to the Court of Claims, directed said court to ascertain (we suppose in the usual way, by evidence) the amount laid out in the purchase of the ice, and all the expenses attending the same.

The action of the Court of Claims on this mandate, to the mind of your committee, was somewhat strange and inexplicable. The report of the Surgeon-General, which is made a part of this report, shows that upon application the court declined to allow any additional testimony to be taken, believing, perhaps, that it could not be regularly done under a mandate; it declined, upon request, to find the facts required by the rules, whereby the right of appeal was cut off under the rules. In allowing a mere fractional part of the claim, it declined, or rather omitted, to state any reasons whatever, either in writing or orally, as the grounds of its decision, leaving the parties wholly in the dark as to the data upon which it gave judgment. The effect of all this was to deny to the claimant a day in court, in the true and proper sense of that term, on the question or right of recovery as laid down by the Supreme Court.

In this attitude of affairs it was impossible for your committee to understand how such a state of things could have occurred, and thinking perhaps there might be something yet behind not disclosed, your committee concluded to send all the papers, together with some new testimony taken by the claimant, to the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War very properly referred the request of the committee to find additional facts and amount due to the Surgeon-General's Office, where the contract for the ice originated, for a reply thereto. The Surgeon-General in his report gives a very full and clear history of the whole transaction, judicial and otherwise, and in the light of the same and all the testimony before him, states an account and the amount still due the claimant under the ruling of the Supreme Court. This report is so satisfactory and so incapable of being gainsaid in its facts and details that your committee have concluded to adopt it as a part of their report, and would call special attention to its statements as furnishing perhaps the best light that can be attained on the subject. It is proper to add that the committee referred the findings of the Surgeon-General to the Secretary of the Treasury. This officer does not question the validity of the findings of the Surgeon-General, but requires an act of Congress to adjudicate the account.

Believing that great injustice has been done the claimant in the premises, your committee recommend payment of the amount, $58,341.85, which the Surgeon-

General finds still to be due the claimant, and report herewith a bill for his relief, and recommend its passage.

SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE, May 25, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to return with the following report the papers referred by you on the 20th instant in connection with a claim of Joseph W. Parish, growing out of his contract to furnish ice in 1863.

Soon after the commencement of hostilities in 1861 ice was found to be indispensable in summer in the hospitals and hospital transports of the Army; but no systematic attempt was made to secure a regular supply until the spring of 1863. Three contracts were then made—with A. T. Edgerton, J. H. Tiffany, and Joseph W. Parish & Co. The two former were to supply the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and the latter the principal points in the Mississippi Valley. The contracts were made in the city of Washington by Henry Johnson, medical storekeeper, under the direction of the then Surgeon-General, William A. Hammond. Mr. Johnson's part was purely ministerial. They were executed at nearly the same time, and were similar in their terms, differing in little else than the names, quantities, and prices.

Owing to the perishable nature of ice and the want of experience in its management, these first contracts were rather crude, if not conflicting, in some of their provisions, and have given occasion to considerable discussion and litigation.

The contract made with William L. Huse and Joseph W. Parish, as J. W. Parish & Co., was dated March 5, 1863.

They engage to "deliver at Memphis, Tenn., Nashville, Tenn., Saint Louis, Mo., and Cairo, Ill., the whole amount of ice required to be consumed at each respective point and vicinity during the remainder of the year 1863. Ice to be in quality A No. 1, and delivered at (2,000) two thousand pounds to the ton."

The stipulated prices were, at Saint Louis $16 per ton, at Cairo and Memphis $20, and at Nashville $25. The usual price paid during the previous summer had been at the rate of $30 per ton at Saint Louis. The contract then proceeds to declare:

"Sixth. All the ice delivered under this contract to be subject to the inspection and approval of the medical officer in charge of the post where it is delivered, and such as does not conform to the specifications set forth in this contract shall be rejected.

"Seventh. That payment shall be made from time to time upon receipted and duplicate accounts, certified to by the medical officer in charge of the post where it is delivered.

* * * * * * *

"Ninth. * * * J. W. Parish & Co. will allow (3) three working days for discharging each cargo; * * * after that demurrage to be allowed * * * as per charter-party or B. of L. of the vessel."

These two last sections evidently contemplate a delivery of the ice by the shipload or boat-load, as was the practice along the seaboard.

William L. Huse, upon learning the terms of the contract, refused to be bound by it, averring that his name had been used without his consent, and the entire interest became vested in J. W. Parish.

Mr. Parish exhibited his contract to Col. R. C. Wood, the assistant surgeon-general at Saint Louis, the chief medical officer in the West, and left a copy with him. Whether his oral representations misled that careful and experienced officer may be doubted, but on the 25th of March Colonel Wood gave him an order in writing, several copies of which occur among these papers, to furnish 5,000 tons each at Saint Louis and Cairo, and 10,000 tons at Memphis and Nashville, respectively; 30,000 in all. He was directed to deliver the ice at Memphis and Nashville without delay. When apprised of this order the Surgeon-General telegraphed to the assistant surgeon-general, March 30:

"Parish & Co. have not contracted for 30,000 tons of ice. Suspend the order you gave him."

On the following day, March 31, the assistant surgeon-general telegraphed to Mr. Parish, supposed to be then at Chicago:

"I am instructed by the Surgeon-General to suspend the order I have given you till further instructions are given from him.

"R. C. WOOD,
"Assistant Surgeon-General."

It is admitted that this action did not cancel the order for 30,000 tons, but left the contractor in uncertainty in reference to it.

It has been denied that Colonel Wood's notice was ever received by Parish, but that point appears to have little or no practical importance. The assistant surgeon-general telegraphs to this office April 2:

"Mr. Parish is here. Will you state what quantities of ice you wish delivered at Saint Louis, Cairo, Memphis, and Nashville? Requisitions are coming in."

The Surgeon-General replied the same day:

"No precise amount can be fixed, as it is not known. Letter written you March 31."

It may, therefore, be safely inferred that Mr. Parish was apprised of the views of the department by about noon of April 2.

Under this suspension or modification of the original order ice was not sent immediately to Memphis and Nashville, and an aggregate of much less than 30,000 tons was delivered and accepted during the year. The bills certified by the medical officers were—

	Tons.
Saint Louis	3,629½
Cairo	1,030½
Memphis	5,990½
Nashville	497
Total	11,137½

It does not appear that any regular system was pursued by making written requisitions upon the contractor for specific quantities to be delivered at times stated. The ice appears for the most part to have been delivered as the contractor could ship it, or to have been regulated by some informal understanding. On one occasion, at least, only a small part of the quantity sent was accepted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana (before the reading of the report was concluded). That report is much more voluminous than I supposed it to be. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] will state the facts of the case I shall be content, without asking for the further reading of the report.

Mr. LYMAN. The facts of the case are fully stated in the report, the reading of which is now nearly finished; but I will, in accordance with the gentleman's request, make a statement of the matter.

After the delivery of the 12,768 tons of ice which were received by the Government Mr. Parish proceeded to purchase at Lake Pepin and on the St. Lawrence, as well as at other points, the additional ice necessary to fill the order which had been given by the assistant surgeon-general at Saint Louis. But the order was suspended, as stated in the report; he was never ordered to furnish this ice; the ice which he had procured wasted away and was an entire loss to him. Immediately after it was determined that the ice was not to be received from him by the Government he brought his action in the Court of Claims, claiming payment at the contract price for the balance of the 30,000 tons, being between 17,000 and 18,000 tons. The Court of Claims found against him upon the technical ground that the assistant surgeon-general at Saint Louis had no right to make the order which had been made. He appealed from that judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States, which reversed the judgment of the Court of Claims, holding that the acts of the assistant surgeon-general at Saint Louis were the acts of his chief, the Surgeon-General at Washington city. But the Supreme Court held that Mr. Parish was not entitled to receive the contract price for the ice, but only what it had cost him to procure it, care for it, and hold it in readiness for the Government; and the case was sent back to the Court of Claims, for the purpose, as is supposed, of ascertaining by taking proof the amount of expenses so incurred. The Court of Claims refused to take any further proof upon that subject. A motion was made by ex-Governor Lowe, of Iowa, the counsel for Parish in the Court of Claims, asking that proof be taken upon that point. The court refused to take the proof.

At a subsequent stage in the proceedings the Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, representing the Government in the Court of Claims, also asked that such proof be taken. Again the court refused. Certain proof, however, had crept into the case during its trial, on the theory that Mr. Parish was entitled to the contract price, from which some kind of a calculation was entered into, and the conclusion arrived at that Mr. Parish had shown an expenditure of between $10,000 and $11,000. This proof, I say, was taken during the course of the trial, upon another theory altogether from that embraced in the decision of the Supreme Court. Upon this proof the Court of Claims awarded damages for between $10,000 and $11,000. They made no finding of fact; they laid no basis upon which Mr. Parish could appeal from their decision to the Supreme Court of the United States. He came to Congress. He has been here during several Congresses. Invariably—I believe without exception—the committees of this House and of the Senate have always reported in favor of the allowance of this claim. The committee of the last Congress, or of the Forty-seventh, referred the matter to the Secretary of War, asking that the facts might be reported to the committee or the House. The Secretary of War referred it to the Surgeon-General—Surgeon-General Barnes, I believe—for investigation and report. He made his report, which was embodied in this report of the committee. He found that Mr. Parish, after all deductions, to which I shall refer in a moment, was yet short $58,341.85 of the money he had actually expended in order that he might be prepared to fulfill the contract which he had made with the Government. This takes into account and gives the Government credit for the $10,444.91 which had been realized on the judgment of the Court of Claims, gives the Government credit for $200 raised by the sale of some lumber which had been in the ice-houses, and for $274.35, money arising in the same way, leaving the balance I have mentioned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those are the facts in the case, and I do not care for the present at least to take any further time in the discussion of the bill. I will reserve the balance of my time until I shall hear what objections, if any, shall be made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was about to ask the gentleman to repeat the amount—which I did not hear from the reading of the report—that is, the amount allowed in this bill as the finding upon the evidence presented under the order of the Supreme Court as to the cost.

Mr. LYMAN. It is based upon the result of the investigation of Surgeon-General Barnes under the direction of the Secretary of War, and as approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But what is the amount?

Mr. LYMAN. Under the rules the Supreme Court laid down as the theory on which the case should be tried.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not understand yet whether this sum was found on evidence before this committee, and, if not, before what body, under the ruling laid down by the Supreme Court as to the amount expended under the order for ice which was not taken by the Government.

Mr. LYMAN. It is based on evidence on file in the War Department and evidence taken before the Court of Claims.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But the Court of Claims, I understand, made an award on the evidence on the subject presented to that court.

Mr. LYMAN. Yes; there was some evidence taken on the subject of expenditures in the Court of Claims, but not taken on the theory that Mr. Parish had the right to recover.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What evidence have we it was not taken on that theory? Did the Court of Claims decline to hear evidence of that kind?

Mr. GEDDES. It did. Let me say when the case was returned to the Court of Claims on the mandate of the Supreme Court, on motion of the attorneys on both sides, each applying to take additional testimony on the new issue thus presented by the judgment of the Supreme Court, it unaccountably does not appear why, but for some reason or other the Court of Claims declined to take any additional testimony, and disposed of the case on the testimony taken before.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How has this additional testimony been taken, let me inquire?

Mr. GEDDES. No additional testimony was taken; but the case was disposed of on that evidence.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Has there been no additional evidence taken at all under the order of the Supreme Court?

Mr. ROWELL. I think I can answer the gentleman. There was on file in the War Department a good deal of evidence as to the cost of ice, through other parties, purchased by the Government at various points where this ice was purchased. That was considered by the Surgeon-General in part.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It would be based, then, not on money expenditures, under the theory of the Supreme Court, but upon what other ice had cost the Government at these other points.

Mr. ROWELL. No, not purchased by contract, but purchased at wholesale by the agents of the Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That may be evidence so far, but what I wish to get at is the character of the evidence, and before whom taken, and how furnished, upon which this difference is based.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me state to the gentleman he will find in the report——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Only a part of the report was read.

Mr. GEDDES. The case came before Congress, and it was referred by the committee to the Secretary of War for investigation. Under that order of reference an investigation was had and the testimony taken, which is set forth in the report in all its details, and report made by the Surgeon-General. Now, in that report of the Surgeon-General I find this statement:

> The Supreme Court hold that the claimant is entitled to recover his necessary expenses in procuring and taking care of the ice. The greater part of these, however, are unknown, and can not be taken into account. Document No. 6 is an affidavit of the claimant that the expenses he incurred in taking care of the ice that was lost would "exceed rather than fall short of the sum of $5,000."

That which could not be ascertained was excluded by the Surgeon-General, and only such items as were furnished to the Government were retained in his account.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then are we to understand that this allowance now reported is made upon evidence which was furnished at or about the time when the loss is alleged to have occurred and not twenty years after? That is the question I would like to have clearly answered. I am very suspicious, Mr. Chairman, about evidence reversing the decisions of a tribunal, which evidence is furnished twenty years after the transaction took place; and that is one of the points I am trying to get at particularly—whether this allowance is made upon evidence furnished at the time or whether it has been furnished recently, and, if so, what the evidence is and how furnished.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on War Claims——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on War Claims whether there had been a delivery of this ice to the Government.

Mr. GEDDES. No, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. None of it was delivered?

Mr. GEDDES. None of this portion for which the claim is now made.

Mr. BAYNE. But the Government had contracted for the purchase of this ice?

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, sir; and then declined to receive it.

Mr. BAYNE. But there had been no actual delivery?

Mr. GEDDES. No, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. Why?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand that the contractor bought the ice, but it perished and never was delivered to the Government.

Mr. BAYNE. Yet the Government is expected to pay for it?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. On the ground that the Government declined to receive it.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know whether my friend from Ohio has yielded the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will yield very cheerfully if my colleague from Ohio will answer the question I have asked or if the gentleman from Pennsylvania can give the information.

Mr. GEDDES. I do not feel at liberty to take the floor from my colleague on the committee [Mr. LYMAN] who has charge of the bill, and I would be glad if the gentleman from Ohio would address his questions to him.

Mr. LYMAN. I will yield the floor to Judge GEDDES.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask what is the sum allowed by the bill?

Mr. GEDDES. It has been already stated as being $58,341.85.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That, as I understand it, is the sum allowed by this committee to cover the expense and outlay incurred in purchasing and caring for this ice by the party from whom it was contracted for by the Government?

Mr. GEDDES. The actual cost so far as it could be ascertained definitely and clearly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am not yet satisfied, Mr. Chairman, as to the character of the evidence upon which this claim is based. I have asked before what tribunal it was presented; who has adjudicated the matter; who has passed upon the evidence. Let us know these facts. Is this report made by the committee now for the first time? Is the evidence on which it is based before the committee in any form, or where does the evidence come from? Is this some old report resurrected and brought in here bodily? I must confess I have a very great suspicion as to these old reports. What I want to get at is simply the facts in the case. And I ask again, has any evidence been presented to the committee showing the amount of money expended by this party under the rule established by the Supreme Court? It seems to me that the rule is a correct one, and if you have the evidence here which is the basis on which this report is founded it would seem that the case has merit, but so far as it has gone it seems to me to be lame right there.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say a word on this subject, if the gentleman from Ohio has concluded.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Just a word further. If evidence has been submitted to this committee and by the committee examined and digested, and if the committee has come to a conclusion that the evidence sustains this report and this loss that is claimed did actually occur, very well. But where is the evidence, before what tribunal taken, or what tribunal has passed upon it? That is the point on which I would like myself a little further explanation. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania can give it I would be very glad.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that this bill is right. I suppose that most any bill that comes from the Committee on War Claims favorably recommended is right, and I am willing to vote for the bill. But while I vote for the bill I want to call attention to the fact of a parallel between this case and a bill which came before the last Congress to which the chairman of the Committee on War Claims was earnestly and zealously opposed. I refer to the claim of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley, of Pittsburgh. If there be in this bill redeeming features, entitling it to a favorable consideration, there was strong reason for a favorable consideration of the report in the case of the bill presented in Captain Bigley's case. I asked the chairman of the committee a short time ago, who favors this case, whether the ice had been delivered. He replied that it had not been. In the case of Captain Bigley a large quantity of coal was purchased and was to be delivered to the Government at Memphis. That coal was not only taken there and delivered, but the Government took absolute and manual possession of it; and yet in the case now pending the chairman of the Committee on War Claims finds a favorable report and advocates the passage of this bill, although there was no delivery to the Government whatever, while in the case of Captain Bigley he opposed the report, although there was an actual delivery and an actual taking possession of the coal by the Government.

Why is it that the chairman of the Committee on War Claims occupies these adverse attitudes upon cases the principles underlying which seem to be almost identical?

Mr. GEDDES. Will the gentleman permit me to answer him?

Mr. BAYNE. I will. I should be glad to hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. GEDDES. Instead of making an argument in advance of a report on a claim that is pending before the War Claims Committee, thus endeavoring—I will not put it in that form—thus taking a course likely to have men prejudge it, would it not be well to apply to that committee for an opportunity to make before it the argument that is being made here, and help us to get through with one case at a time?

Mr. BAYNE. That is a matter of taste. I choose to stand responsible for the proprieties of my course on this occasion in calling the attention of the House to a comparison between these two cases and the attitude of the chairman of the Committee on War Claims with respect to them.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will my colleague [Mr. BAYNE] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to address to the chairman of the Committee on War Claims the inquiry, whether it is not a matter of propriety to discuss here and now whether it is to be the policy of that committee to consider the equities of a case as well as the propriety of singling out one of the claims merely and passing upon it? If you are to pay this man for the ice before it is delivered, certainly you should establish the principle of paying for supplies after they have been delivered to the Government.

Mr. GEDDES. I regard the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] as a very pertinent and proper one; and when any such case arises I shall certainly meet it. But to assume that there is some case back of this unknown to the House and not before us where there has been some delivery and about which there is a controversy—to undertake in that way and on that assumption either to defeat this claim or to carry it through I think is an objectionable mode of proceeding.

Mr. STEELE. Are we to understand that the chairman of the Committee on War Claims has decided against the case of the coal man but in favor of this claim?

Mr. GEDDES. That is a mistaken understanding, unless it is based upon the action of this House and what occurred on this floor in the last Congress. The case referred to was discussed on the floor from time to time and different gentlemen took different views of it; lawyers took different views of it. The matter passed over. That case is now under consideration in the Committee on War Claims, and it does seem to me there will be abundance of time for us to consider its merits when it comes before this House.

Mr. BAYNE. That is a species of special pleading, and the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, if he will permit me to say so, is now occupying the position of a special pleader.

Mr. GEDDES. It is a good thing to be a good special pleader.

Mr. BAYNE. What I say is, it is right we should have general principles upon which to decide these cases, and I think it is fair that the attitude the chairman of the Committee on War Claims took in a case of this kind last Congress should be referred to, if the position he takes now is inconsistent with the position he took then. And I call attention to the fact for the purpose of ascertaining now whether we are going to be governed by principles and a rule which will apply alike to both these cases and to such others as may arise.

I believe this man, when the ice was ordered by that surgeon of the Government, if it were ordered and the Government failed to take it, ought to be paid. But I contend also when the Government ordered this coal to be delivered at Memphis, Tenn., and the man ran the gauntlet of guerrillas and all sorts of attacks along the river and delivered it, fulfilling his contract as well as fulfilling a patriotic duty, he should be paid for that coal, the Government having taken part of the barges across the river and taken possession of the coal. I want to know if that principle is to prevail or whether fish is to be made of one and fowl of another, whether the locus in quo is to have anything to do with it or whether the fate of each claim is to depend on its honest merits? I am not opposed to this man being paid for his ice. I will have him paid for his ice so far as my vote goes, but I want all to be treated alike.

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFORD. My recollection is—and I had something to do with the case to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers—my recollection is, that the delivery was to the confederates in the case he talks about. [Laughter.] I think the gentleman had better clear that up.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman is quite wrong in his recollection.

Mr. WOLFORD. I will stake my reputation upon it.

Mr. BAYNE. If the gentleman will give me his attention I will make it very clear to him. It is shown by the evidence that on the side of the river opposite to Memphis, a mile and a half from that city, was a point at which the coal had been delivered many times. It was the custom to deliver it there. It was shown that the coal was taken to that point and safely landed there; that at that time it was impossible to go over to the wharf at Memphis, but that Captain Bigley went over to the city and notified the quartermaster that his coal was there; that the quartermaster sent over a boat from the Memphis side of the river and took three barges of that coal over to Memphis, and then sent a number of marines across the river to watch the coal and protect it from guerrillas, but that after those marines had gone over there and gone into possession of the boats he recalled them, and during the night the guerrillas came and burned the boats and the coal, and he lost everything. If anything is clear, those facts are clear in that case.

Mr. WOLFORD. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. Did this man deliver the coal where they told him to deliver it? Did they not tell him to land it on the other side, a few miles above, and did he not refuse to do that?

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir; nothing of the sort. There is not a tittle of evidence to show it. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is drawing on his imagination now.

Mr. WOLFORD. Not a bit of it.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman had better read the evidence.

Mr. WOLFORD. I did read it in the last Congress, and if you will get the papers I will show you the facts.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, before this bill is laid aside I wish to say a word. I have not been able to discover on what evidence this claim is to be allowed; not on evidence before the Court of Claims, because they awarded another sum; not on any evidence presented to this committee, because, as I understand, they have taken none; but on some evidence presented somewhere there has been a recommendation made to the House to make a certain allowance in this case. Who has seen that evidence? Who has adjudicated the case upon that evidence? That is what I would like to find out. If the adjudication is upon evidence presented before a clerk in some Department, it seems to me that that is not sufficient to satisfy this House as to the merits of this claim. I agree that the theory of the claim is right, that this contractor is entitled at least to the money expended in complying with the conditions of the contract in furnishing the ice. The theory is correct, undoubtedly, and therefore the only question is one of fact and of evidence as to the amount that he ought to receive. Now if the gentleman who has charge of this bill will answer this question I shall be satisfied.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain the case to the gentleman's satisfaction. I examined this claim as a subcommittee in the last Congress and wrote a report in its favor. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will read the report of Surgeon-General Barnes he will find the basis upon which this amount was ascertained. A very large amount of testimony was taken in the Court of Claims. That court certified a certain class of facts as found. Included in that certification was the fact that of the 30,000 tons of ice this man had lost some 17,000 tons.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then that is the report of the Surgeon-General upon evidence examined in his office.

Mr. ROWELL. Upon evidence examined in his office.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very good. So far we know where we are.

Mr. ROWELL. When the case came back from the Supreme Court that court had laid down the basis upon which a judgment should be entered up, and had decided that, instead of the contract price, this claimant should receive the amount of his losses and expenditures. The Court of Claims had already found, as a matter of fact, that he had lost over 17,000 tons of this ice. Motion was made by the counsel for Mr. Parish to take additional testimony as to cost and expenses. That was refused. He was not permitted to take that testimony; I suppose upon the theory that the mandate compelled them to make up a judgment upon the testimony already in. They declined, however, to make any certificate of how they found, and the facts we do not know, except that we do know they determined to beat the Supreme Court in the case. When this matter was referred to the Surgeon-General he took the whole body of the testimony taken before the Court of Claims. He compared the duplicates presented by the claimant with those presented in the Court of Claims. He then took evidence in the War Department in regard to contemporaneous matters, in regard to the original cost of ice at that time and at these various places—evidence that could have been presented to the Court of Claims as a part of the records of the War Department, for that would have been legitimate, but not evidence taken later. The attempt to take later testimony was in regard to expenditures in and about purchasing and caring for that ice, and the great body of those expenditures was ruled out and was entirely lost to Mr. Parish.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then, Mr. Chairman, it amounts to this: the report of this committee is based upon evidence taken by the Surgeon-General; and this bill comes in here as the recommendation of that department based upon testimony taken there. That is the case in a nutshell.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not know that there can be any objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When the evidence comes before us only in this way I must vote against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] moves that the Senate bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

VICTOR BEAUBOUCHER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beauboucher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and directed to audit the expenditures of Victor Beauboucher, late consul of the United States at Jerusalem, made in 1866 and 1867, and to determine what allowance, if any, shall be made to him upon principles of justice and equity; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay to said Victor Beauboucher such sum as may be awarded by the Secretary of State, not to exceed the sum of $4,000.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the last Congress directed by a unanimous vote a favorable report on this bill. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House has done the same thing. The measure has been approved and indorsed by the State Department. It involves an amount of money not exceeding $4,000—the sum within those limits to be adjusted by the Secretary of State. The bill proposes to refund to the claimant, who was at the time a consul of the United States in Jerusalem, funds which he advanced for the succor of some American citizens who found themselves at Jaffa without food and without money. He advanced his own money to the amount stated; and in this way the American citizens who constituted what is historically known as the Jaffa colony were kept from starvation and enabled to return to their homes. This is the whole story. It is told with more detail in the report, which is not a long one, and I ask that it may be read. After the reading I shall be glad to give any information which may not have been covered by this statement of mine and which shall not be found within the lines of that report.

The report (by Mr. PHELPS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beauboucher, beg leave respectfully to report:

Victor Beauboucher was, at the time concerned, the consul of the United States at Jerusalem. He received the appointment from President Lincoln, although still a French subject, in recognition of gallant services in the Union Army. In that cause he had lost one of his legs.

In the winter of 1866-'67, the colony of misguided Americans who had been led to settle at Jaffa, under the fanatic lead of the Rev. G. J. Adams, were brought to the verge of destitution. They had neither food nor money, nor resources to procure either. Under these circumstances, Beauboucher came to their rescue and made constant trips between Jerusalem and Jaffa, and rendered all the aid he could. He made advances, to relieve their immediate necessities and to aid their escape from Palestine, to the amount of $3,618.80 in gold. He asks the Government to repay this without interest.

His application, indorsed by Secretary Fish, was transmitted to Senator Sumner, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. A bill, introduced by Mr. Sumner, granting the relief sought, was passed in the Senate. It seems never to have been pushed in the House, Beauboucher's infirmities and health and possible absence preventing him from giving personal supervision to his case.

The same causes, possibly aided by a feeling of discouragement not unnatural to his race or to any one else under the circumstances, seems to account for subsequent delay in its prosecution. The committee find in this delay nothing to invalidate their faith in the justice of Beauboucher's demand, which at the time received the indorsement of the American minister at Constantinople, Mr. E. Joy Morris; Governor Perham, of Maine, and Mr. Israel Washburn, collector of the port of Portland, who seem to have had a personal acquaintance with and regard for the claimant.

The unhappy colonists, to the number of forty or more, mainly Maine folk, declared their appreciation and gratitude for his services in a letter to him, now in the files of the State Department.

And, as before noted, the Department itself recommended some appropriation to reimburse him for his outlays. Under these circumstances the committee have no hesitancy in recommending the passage of the accompanying bill, which leaves the adjustment of the amount, under fair limits, and all other details, to the discretion of the Secretary of State.

Mr. PHELPS. Unless some members of the Committee of the Whole desire further discussion I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

GEORGE S. HUNT & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1005) for the relief of George S. Hunt & Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Messrs. George S. Hunt & Co., of Portland, Me., the sum of $5,352.59, being amount of excess of duties illegally collected of them on certain cargoes of sugar.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Ways and Means was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the words "during the year 1881."

Mr. REED, of Maine. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. REED, of Maine) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1005) for the relief of George S. Hunt & Co., have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

During the year 1881 Messrs. George S. Hunt & Co., of Portland, Me., imported sugars into the United States, and paid thereon the duties exacted under the Treasury regulation requiring the polariscope test. They made protest to the collector in due form of law, and then appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury. This, they were informed by the deputy collector, Lewis B. Smith, an official of many years' standing, was all that was necessary to protect their rights. Some time thereafter the courts decided that the position taken by Messrs. Hunt & Co. in regard to the polariscope test was correct. They thereupon made application for a refund of the amount overpaid in 1881, which was $5,352.59, and were informed that, in addition to the protest and appeal already described, they should have brought suit in the courts.

Upon investigation, it appears that the Department entertained the same view of the law which the deputy collector had stated to Messrs. Hunt & Co., and that directions have been actually issued for refunding in like cases. Upon receipt of such instructions the New York custom-house officials suggested an objection, and the construction of the law was referred to the Attorney-General, who decided that the Secretary of the Treasury had not the power of refunding, unless a suit had been brought. It should be added that every importer who was properly advised, and who brought suit, has been paid by the Treasury Department. Very large sums have been repaid. Under this state of facts the situation seems to be as follows:

Messrs. George S. Hunt & Co. paid the Government $5,352.59 which the Government had no right to exact. They made protest and appeal, and were assured by an officer of the Government that nothing more was needed to preserve their rights. It seems that the Department was of the same opinion.

The sole defense that can be made is purely technical. While the committee do not undertake to proclaim the doctrine that the Government is responsible for the statements of its officers as to questions of law, they do think that in this case the refusal to pay back would be unjust and inequitable, and consequently recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment adding the words "during the year 1881."

Mr. REED, of Maine. This report so fully discloses the facts in this case, that unless some one desires to debate the proposition I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BEACH. I do not rise to oppose this bill; I think that it is a very meritorious measure, and that these merchants should have a refund of these excessive duties. But I would like to ask my friend from Maine why the Committee on Ways and Means has not brought into this House a general bill covering all these special cases. I see on the Calendar two cases of a similar nature following this one.

Now, I am opposed to special legislation of this character. If it is right that these merchants of Portland and Boston should have a refund of these duties, why is it not right that other merchants, merchants of New York and Baltimore and New Orleans, who are similarly situated, should have the benefit of like legislation?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] that the general question has not been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means by any bill which has been introduced. If there has been such a bill introduced, it has not been brought to the attention of the committee. When the subject is properly presented, I am unable to see how either the committee or the House can refuse their approval of such a measure.

Mr. BEACH. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that three bills of this character were before the Committee on Ways and Means was sufficient notice to the committee that there were doubtless other claims of a similar character, and the committee should have formulated a general bill of which all parties having claims of this nature could have the benefit.

Mr. REED, of Maine. There was not the slightest indication before the committee of any other claims of this character.

Mr. BEACH. Are there not three bills of this character in immediate succession on the Calendar?

Mr. REED, of Maine. There are; and those three have received the approval of the committee as well as of a committee of the previous House. No other bills of this character have been presented; and I do not see how the committee can be said to have had notice of the existence of other bills.

Mr. BEACH. And each of these bills is a special bill?

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is true.

Mr. BEACH. Why not, then, have a general bill, which would take no longer to pass than any one of these particular bills?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Simply because we are to-day face to face not with that question, but the present one.

Mr. BEACH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I wish at the proper time—I presume it is not in order now—to make a motion to recommit this bill——

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion.

Mr. BEACH. With instructions to the committee to formulate a general bill which shall embrace all cases of this description, and thus dispense with the necessity of this special legislation. There is no reason why our Calendar should be crowded with these special bills; there is no reason why the time of Congress should be taken up in their consideration.

Mr. REED, of Maine. These three claims having received the approval of the Committee of Ways and Means, I hope they will receive the approval of the House; and I do not wish to see them sacrificed upon general principles.

Mr. BEACH. My experience teaches me that the best way to procure legislation on any subject is to stop the passage of these special bills. When we reach a point where it is understood that these special bills will not be permitted to go through, then we shall pass general laws covering all these particular cases.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I understand that this bill as presented requires the payment of $5,352.59. If that is the case, the amendment reported by the Committee on Ways and Means is necessary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When was this money collected?

Mr. REED, of Maine. In 1881; and we propose now to refund the amount without interest. I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York submit the motion to recommit?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not in order until we get into the House. The bill can be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman has no motion pending at this time.

Mr. BEACH. I did not make any motion at this time, but merely gave notice I would submit the motion to recommit when we got into the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not had the opportunity of examining the details of this bill further than from the reading of the report. There are quite a number of cases of this kind, nearly all of which have been referred to the Committee on Claims. Under the new rules this claim should have gone to that committee, but by unanimous consent three cases were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. Of course, by going to that committee, which has very few private claims before it, this case got before the House much sooner than it could have done if it had been referred to the Committee on Claims, where, as I have said, it properly belongs.

I do not complain of that, because that committee is overburdened and has before it a great many cases of this kind now pending. But, sir, it does seem a little hard that two or three claimants should be favored and get their claims through, while others of equal merit are required to await the slow course of other committees which are burdened under the rules with many cases of the same sort.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the proposition suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH], of allowing these claims to go before some court for disposal or to come in under some general law. Where importers have paid taxes illegally to the Government they ought to have a forum into which they can take their claims and have them adjudicated.

I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] whether there was not a forum, or at least some place where these claimants could have properly taken their claims and brought suit?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Not under the state of information they had. If the gentleman has read the report, as I have no doubt he has——

Mr. SPRINGER. I have.

Mr. REED, of Maine. He will see these gentlemen were misled by statements made innocently by an officer of the Government; that these statements were made on a point of law which was so close that the Treasury Department itself, under the control of Mr. Folger, was of the same opinion as the Government officer who gave these gentlemen the advice they had done right, that it was necessary, and that orders were actually issued for payment in such cases; but gentlemen connected with the New York custom-house insisted the other course ought to have been taken, and on reference of the matter to the Attorney-General, the Attorney-General thought differently from Secretary Folger. It was a difference of opinion between two distinguished lawyers.

Mr. BEACH. As to procedure.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Yes, as to procedure. There is no question about amount. There is no question about the sums being due these parties—no question whatever as to the justice of the claim. It is only a point of omission, which omission was made under the suggestion of one of the most accomplished customs officers we have in the United States, a gentleman who has served for a long time with great satisfaction to everybody connected with the business.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman explain to the committee what was the difference between requiring the polariscope test and the test which should have been legally applied in measuring the amount of tax to be paid on this sugar?

Mr. REED, of Maine. The difference in this particular instance is precisely the sum named in the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. That, of course, I understand.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not know I catch the purport of the gentleman's question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to know why the Treasury officials should apply a test which was illegal at the time.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Because in the opinion of the then Secretary of the Treasury that was the suitable test to apply; but the courts of law, on the matter being referred to them, took a different view of the law.

Mr. SPRINGER. In what case was that decided?

Mr. REED, of Maine. It was decided in a case I have somewhere among the papers, but it is a case decided in the United States courts and acquiesced in by the Department.

Mr. MORRISON. Under which the Department has paid all the other claims.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Since that time the Department has paid, on claims of this kind where suits had been entered, $1,500,000, or thereabouts, as is certified to me by Mr. Macgregor, chief of the Customs Department.

Mr. SPRINGER. In pursuance of suits?

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is, where suits had been brought, where nothing had been done beyond mere entry.

The only fault I can see these people are chargeable with is they have not been more just to the members of a deserving profession so largely represented upon the floor of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. They ought to be fined.

Mr. REED, of Maine. They are fined the entire interest of this case.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That shows their good sense.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I am pained to hear my friend from Kansas say so. I expressed the real sentiment of the House a moment ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Maine has made an impression upon this House by his statement which I believe to be erroneous. He says that this question as to what the importer or merchant should have done at the time of paying this duty was a question of delicate law, about which those who were qualified to express an opinion were in great doubt. Now, the veriest tyro in the profession, by looking at the section of the Revised Statutes referring to this subject, can see what a merchant, about to pay duty upon imported goods believed to be erroneous or excessive, is called upon to do; that is, in the first place, he has to file a notice of protest with the collector; and, in the second place, within thirty days thereafter he has to take an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury. If the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury is adverse to him, then under the statute he is obliged to bring a suit within ninety days. Now, as I understand the case before the House to-day, these merchants complied with two of the provisions of of the statute, namely, the protest was filed and an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Treasury; but there was a failure to bring suit or any action in the United States courts for recovery of the alleged excessive duty, and by reason of that failure these parties forfeited under the law all rights to a refund of the duties claimed to be excessive. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. REED, of Maine. It seems to be.

Mr. BEACH. It seems to me, then, that they were in ignorance of their own rights, and ignorantia legis non excusat the gentleman knows very well.

The Government has the money of these merchants; it belongs to them, and ought to be returned; and the point I make is not against the refunding of the money to them, but that we should have a general bill which will take in all these cases, the three now being pressed by the gentleman from Maine and all of those which have been referred to the Committee on Claims, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of that committee.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If there is no further debate, I ask a vote upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to the bill the words "during the year 1881."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHINNEY & JACKSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1006) for the relief of Phinney & Jackson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Messrs. Phinney & Jackson, of Portland, Me., $5,496.18, being excess of duties illegally collected from them on certain cargoes of sugar during 1881.

Mr. REED, of Maine. This is precisely the same case as the last bill, and I desire to propose an amendment, on account of an error in the figures. I find instead of the figures contained in the bill that the amount should be $5,212.02.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What are the figures in the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. A little more than that sum.

Mr. MORRISON. That is the amount ascertained by the Treasury Department to be correct.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I am informed by the authorities of the Treasury Department that this is the correct amount. There are no facts that are stated in the report which are not corroborated by official certificates.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. These figures are certified to as correct?

Mr. REED, of Maine. They are. So far as the Hunt & Co. bill is concerned I have the approval, as to the amount, of the chief of the Customs Division; and as to the next bill, the one in favor of Hall & Co., I have a telegram from the collector of the port of Boston, Mr. Saltonstall, that the amount is correct.

I therefore move to strike out the figures contained in the bill under consideration and insert the sum of $5,212.02.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DUDLEY HALL & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1007) for the relief of Dudley Hall & Co.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Dudley Hall & Co., of Boston, Mass., the sum of $3,426.85, being amount of excess of duties illegally collected of them on certain importations of sugar made in May, 1881, at Boston, on steamer Leo, from Matanzas, Cuba.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is the third bill of the same character; the same state of facts exists, and the figures are correct. They are certified in the telegram to which I have referred.

Mr. BEACH. And therefore, being correct, it is a very good reason why the general bill should pass.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. There is no doubt of that. We are all in favor of a general bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Are the facts on which this bill is based the same as in the other bills?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Precisely.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF LITTLE ROCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Arkansas, to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock; reported by Mr. WILKINS from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, located at Little Rock, Ark., shall be changed to the First National Bank of Little Rock whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolutions of the board and cause a copy of such resolutions, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock shall devolve upon and inure to the First National Bank of Little Rock whenever such change of name is effected.

Mr. ROGERS. There is an amendment to the bill reported by the committee, in which I move concurrence.

Mr. DINGLEY. This bill, I understand, is on the House Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is a mistake; it is here on the Private Calendar by order of the House.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. I ask whether the bill the Clerk has in his hands is the bill which has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BEACH. The identical bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. The amendment proposed by the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, after the words "directors of said bank," insert as follows:
"Having been previously authorized by a vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of said bank."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BEACH. The same objections I felt it to be my duty to raise to the bills considered a few moments ago I now raise to this bill. In every Congress we have a large number of these bills introduced, coming from all parts of the country, to change the names and locations of national banks or to increase their capital stock. They are a class of bills with which we should not be bothered here. They can all be covered by a general law; and we can pass a general law in the time that it takes us to pass one of these bills. I introduced a bill for that purpose, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and which has been reported back favorably by that committee and is now on the Calendar. I understand it is the intention of the gentleman having it in charge to bring it up probably in the early part of next week. I think this bill should be passed over till that general act is passed. What is asked by this bill may be all right and proper, but I object to it because it is in the nature of special legislation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York it is true that a general bill has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. A similar bill was reported in the Forty-eighth Congress but did not become a law. The gentlemen interested in this national bank at Little Rock are desirous its name should be changed immediately in order to carry out some arrangements they wish made. There may be considerable delay in passing the general law; and since this bill has been reported unanimously and is now before the Committee of the Whole with a slight amendment, it seems to me the right course is to immediately concur in the Senate bill and let the gentlemen interested go on with the arrangements they propose to make.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has stated the case so well that I will not undertake to supplement his statement in any way. I therefore insist on my motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK OF WINONA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona; reported by Mr. DINGLEY from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of The National Bank of Winona, located in the city of Winona and State of Minnesota, be changed to The First National Bank of Winona whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, confirmed by a vote or the written consent of stockholders holding two-thirds of the stock of the bank, and cause a copy of such action, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance shall be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, shall be borne by said bank.

SEC. 2. That all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of The National Bank of Winona shall devolve upon and inure to the said The First National Bank of Winona whenever such change is effected; and that the said The First National Bank of Winona shall continue to be in all respects the identical association it was before the change of name under the provisions of this act; and that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release The National Bank of Winona from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said bank may be or become a party interested.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. It is identical with the bill just passed, except that there is no amendment reported to this bill.

Mr. BEACH. I only desire to enter my protest against the bill for the reasons I have already stated, that it is special legislation, and a general bill should be passed to cover all such cases.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] why he opposes all these bills? Let him give some reason for doing so.

Mr. BEACH. If the gentleman had listened to the reasons I gave a few moments ago he would not now repeat his question.

Mr. STEELE. But the gentleman was then speaking of a different bill.

Mr. BEACH. The same reasons which impelled me to oppose the one impel me to oppose the other. Here is a simple act of administration which the Comptroller of the Currency can perform as well as the House. We can pass a general law giving the Comptroller of the Currency power to change the name of a bank. Let us pass such general law and get rid of all this special legislation.

Mr. WILKINS. We could pass this bill in the time the gentleman from New York has been occupying.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF MINNEAPOLIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1260) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Minneapolis, Minn., not to exceed $2,000,000.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the First National Bank of Minneapolis, located in the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, is hereby authorized to increase its capital stock, in accordance with existing laws, to any sum not exceeding $2,000,000, notwithstanding the limit heretofore fixed in its original articles of association and determined by the Comptroller of the Currency; and the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to fix the limit of increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Minneapolis, Minn., at any sum not exceeding $2,000,000.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 9, after the word "currency," insert the following:

Whenever the board of directors of said bank shall be authorized so to do by vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of same.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. SNYDER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred House bill No. 1260, entitled "A bill to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Minneapolis, Minn., not to exceed $2,000,000," having had the same under consideration, recommend that said bill do pass, with the following amendment:

After the word "currency," in line 9, insert the following: "Whenever the board of directors of said bank shall be authorized so to do by a vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of same."

Mr. MILLER. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like a little information about this bill. I would like to know why these parties can not make the desired increase under the present law without coming here for a special act?

Mr. MILLER. That question was submitted to Attorney-General Brewster two years ago, and he delivered an opinion that after the amount of the capital stock of a national bank had been fixed by the articles of association neither the stockholders, the board of directors, nor the Comptroller of the Currency could increase the capital stock beyond the limit fixed, and that all three together could not do it—that it would require a special act of Congress. Upon that opinion we introduced a bill in the last Congress to give the Comptroller, in connection with the stockholders and the directors of a bank, power to authorize the increase of their capital stock; but that bill did not come up for consideration. We have introduced the same bill again, but I understand there is considerable opposition to it, upon the ground that it confers too much authority upon the Comptroller.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the present capital stock of this bank?

Mr. MILLER. The present capital stock is $600,000.

Mr. Chairman, I now move that the amendment reported by the committee be concurred in.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to this bill, which I send to the desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] move to amend the amendment?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir. I wish to amend the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Very well. I will offer the amendment when it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the words "Comptroller of the Currency," in line 9, insert the words "whenever the board of directors of said bank shall be authorized so to do by a vote of the shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment to the bill, and ask that it be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add, at the end of line 14, the following:
"And the said bank is hereby authorized to keep its entire reserve in standard silver dollars."

[Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] desires to be heard at length upon the amendment just offered by him, and he yields to me that I may make a motion that the committee now rise. I make that motion.

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no!"

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, before the question is put upon that motion, I desire to ask the committee to proceed with the consideration of the pending bill, and also the next one on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] yielding the floor for that purpose. I insist that he shall proceed now.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If there is objection to the motion just made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] I will proceed now, but I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] would withdraw his objection.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] can obtain the floor again, I have no objection to withdrawing my motion to enable the committee to dispose of these two bills, after which I shall renew it.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw the motion.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion for the time being.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if it is the desire of gentlemen to have other bills considered and passed upon at this time, I will yield for that purpose. I understand that there is only one bill that can be reached to-day, and I will yield to enable the committee to consider that.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK OF LINCOLN, PA.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2139) authorizing the National Bank of Lincoln, Pa., to change its location and name.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Lincoln National Bank, now located in the village of Lincoln and State of Pennsylvania, is hereby authorized to change its location to the village of Ephratah, in said State. Whenever the stockholders representing two-thirds of the capital of said bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change, the president and cashier shall execute a certificate, under the corporate seal of the bank, specifying such determination, and shall cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and thereupon such change of location shall be effected, and the operations of discount and deposit of said bank shall be carried on in the village of Ephratah.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said bank from any liability or effect any action or proceeding in law in which the said bank may be a party or interested; and when such change shall have been determined upon as aforesaid, notice thereof, and of such change, shall be published in two weekly papers in the county of Lancaster and said State not less than four weeks.

SEC. 3. That whenever the location of said bank shall have been changed from the village of Lincoln to the village of Ephratah, in accordance with the first section of this act, its name shall be changed to the Lincoln National Bank of Ephratah, Pa., if the board of directors of said bank, having been previously authorized by vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of said bank, shall accept the name by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Lincoln National Bank of Lincoln, Pa., shall devolve upon the Lincoln National Bank of Ephratah, Pa., whenever such change of name is effected.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, from the report of the committee upon this bill it appears that all the parties in interest have concluded that they do not desire to change either the name or the location of the bank. I therefore move that the bill be laid aside, in order that a motion may be made in the House to lay it upon the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proper way to accomplish the gentleman's object would be to move to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BRADY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be reported adversely to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STRAIT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass to page 8 of the Calendar, and take up House bill No. 1245, which is of a similar nature to the bills just disposed of.

Mr. BEACH. I must object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that they had had various bills under consideration, and had instructed him to report them favorably to the House, some with and some without amendments, and also one bill adversely.

The SPEAKER. The House will now proceed to the consideration of the several bills just reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

FRANCES E. STEWART.

The first business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a recommendation that it pass, and that House bill 3830, identical in its terms, be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a resolution in regard to this bill which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, with instructions to so amend the bill as to refer the claim therein named to the Court of Claims, with instructions to hear testimony and adjust said claim on the basis of the decision and judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Parish vs. United States, October term, 1879, and render judgment accordingly; the sum allowed claimant in the former adjudication to be considered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on this motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on War Claims.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 56, noes 75.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me to move simply that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims; and I am perfectly willing to put the motion in that form, although I think it would be better to accompany it with instructions. I modify my motion so as merely to move that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. TUCKER. As I understood the motion—and that understanding controlled my vote—it was a motion to recommit the bill with a direction to the committee to report a bill providing that this claim be sent to the Court of Claims, with instructions to that court to decide it in a particular way. It seems to me that we can not direct a court as to the decision it shall render.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana modifies his motion so as to move simply that the bill be recommited to the Committee on War Claims.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 76.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted; and I ask the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 32, noes 83; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana intend to include in his motion both the Senate bill and the House bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 128, not voting 104; as follows:

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LYMAN demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a substitution of one bill for another?

The SPEAKER. It was reported to the Chair that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had taken up and considered the Senate bill and reported it to the House with the recommendation it do pass, and also that it reported back the House bill with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

House bill 3830 was laid on the table.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that by unanimous consent the standing order of the House for Friday evening sessions be set aside for this evening only. The reason I do this is that while a large number of cases are upon the Calendar, yet the reports have not been circulated among members, and they have not had opportunity to examine them. I have consulted the chairmen of other committees interested in this work, and they all agree the session for this evening should be postponed until members shall have an opportunity to examine the committee reports.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALLL. In the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] I report from the Committee on Appropriations bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. It is my understanding the gentleman from Illinois will return Tuesday next, at which time the bill will be called up for consideration. It may, however, be necessary to consider it sooner.

Mr. ROGERS. I reserve all points of order.

GEORGE S. HUNT & CO.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 1005) for the relief of George S. Hunt & Co. has been reported back with an amendment. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "sugar," in line 7, insert "during the year 1881."

The amendment was agreed to, and as amended the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BEACH. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report a general bill covering all claims of a similar character.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I make the point of order such instruction can not be given.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken; a private bill can not be converted into a general bill.

The bill as amended was passed.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles were passed without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beauboucher;

A bill (H. R. 1007) for the relief of Dudley Hall & Co.; and

A bill (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona.

Amendments to bills of the following titles were agreed to; and as amended the bills were severally passed:

A bill (H. R. 1006) for the relief of Phinney & Jackson; and

A bill (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock.

The bill (H. R. 1260) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Minneapolis, Minn., not to exceed $2,000,000.

The bill (H. R. 3129) authorizing the National Bank of Lincoln, Pa., to change its name and location was, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, laid on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MORRISON moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. LAIRD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 11th day of February, immediately after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (No. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and that the consideration of the same be continued Thursday and Saturday, and Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and that the previous question be moved Thursday, the 18th of February, at 3 o'clock p. m., and that a recess be taken on Tuesday, February 16, from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7 o'clock p. m. of that day, and that the evening session be devoted to the consideration of House bill 67.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HIESTAND. I object.

Mr. HOUK. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, as every member of the committee of both parties has agreed to this motion.

Mr. HIESTAND. I withdraw objection.

There being no further objection, the resolution was adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday next.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 7.

Whereas the action of Land Commissioner Sparks in indiscriminately and indefinitely suspending the issuance of patents in some of the land districts of the State of Kansas has worked and is working great hardship to a large number of bona fide settlers on the public lands within this State, by casting a cloud upon the title of their land, without providing any means for a speedy hearing, and thereby compelling many settlers to abandon their claims for want of funds to make payment for the same and to subsist till they realize from crops; and

Whereas, while we deprecate all attempts to fraudulently obtain title to the public domain and heartily indorse every effort to discover such frauds and punish the offenders, yet we believe the present method of the Land Commissioner neither practicable nor just; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring therein), That we instruct our Senators and request our Representatives in Congress to take such steps in the matter as shall give bona fide settlers on public lands speedy relief.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1405), to provide for the study of the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics and of their effects upon the human system in connection with the several divisions of the subject of physiology and hygiene by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and of the District of Columbia, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and Indian and colored schools in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

Ordered, That the annual report of the Public Printer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, lie on the table and be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING EXPENDITURES.

Mr. MAHONE. In obedience to a resolution of the Senate passed at the last session of Congress I submit a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds covering a statement of appropriations and expenditures for public buildings from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1885; and I ask that 100 copies may be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some years ago I introduced a resolution calling for that information from the Secretary of the Treasury, and a report was made, but it has never yet been printed. It is a very valuable document, and I object to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds having an exclusive right to the use of such a document. We all ought to have it; it ought to be printed as a Senate document, and not simply 100 copies of it for the use of the committee. The rest of us would like to look at it and get the information it contains.

Mr. MAHONE. It is not to be printed for the use of the committee; it is for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the usual number of copies be printed, or that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for examination and report, whichever may be appropriate.

Mr. MAHONE. I have no objection to having the usual number printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the usual number of copies be printed instead of 100. If there be no objection the motion will be considered as agreed to, and the order will be made for printing the usual number.

THE LATE ISRAEL KIMBALL, JR.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back a resolution with a substitute and recommend the passage of the substitute.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. Lotta Lapham Kimball, widow of Israel Kimball, jr., deceased, late clerk to the Committee on Education and Labor, the sum of $2,190, being an amount equal to one year's salary at the rate per diem allowed by law to the clerk aforesaid, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute reported by the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert:

That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. Lotta Lapham Kimball, widow of Israel Kimball, jr., deceased, late clerk of the Committee on Education and Labor, the sum of $1,095, being an amount equal to six months' salary at the rate per diem allowed by law to the clerk aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

LAND GRANT WAGON-ROADS IN OREGON.

Mr. DOLPH. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back the resolution introduced by myself in regard to land-grant wagon-roads in Oregon with an amendment. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. I suppose it will lead to no discussion.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, at the end of line 8 to strike out the semicolon, and after the word "all," in the third line from the bottom of the resolution, to insert the words "official documents and;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate copies of all maps, papers, and documents on file in the Interior Department showing the location of wagon-roads in the State of Oregon under the provisions of grants made to said State to aid in the construction of military wagon-roads, and the time when such locations were made; of all papers and documents filed as evidence of the completion of said roads and compliance with the conditions upon which said grants were made by private corporations to whom said grants were transferred by said State; and a statement of the number of acres of land to which said companies became or would have become entitled to upon compliance with the conditions of such grants, the number of acres within the limits of each of said grants surveyed to this date, the number of acres selected and listed by each of said companies, and the number of acres heretofore patented to each of said companies, together with copies of all official documents and papers showing or tending to show a failure on the part of said State or said private corporations to comply with the conditions upon which such grants were made.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] declaring that executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session, have had the same under consideration, and direct me to report it adversely and to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed. I understand that the Senator from Connecticut desires that the matter should go upon the Calendar with the adverse report, and to that I consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, makes an adverse report on the adoption of a resolution which will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session, except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, with the adverse report, will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I am glad that the committee have consented that the report shall be placed on the Calendar. I shall desire, when it comes up in its order, or perhaps earlier, at the convenience of the Senate, to submit some reasons why I think the resolution should be adopted, notwithstanding the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships to submit a report, and I present with it an order for printing the usual number and a certain number of additional copies, and ask the reference thereof to the Committee on Printing.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the usual number of the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships be printed, and 8,000 additional copies also; 1,000 copies each for the War and Navy Departments, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

BUSTS FOR THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. VOORHEES. In response to a resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and adopted by the Senate on the 27th of January, I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That marble busts of those who have been Vice-Presidents of the United States shall be placed in the vacant niches of the Senate Chamber; that the Architect of the Capitol is authorized, subject to the advice and approval of the Senate Committee on the Library, to carry into execution the object of this resolution, and the expenses incurred in doing so shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

I ask that the resolution be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1407) in relation to Indian depredations; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. At some future time, if it be agreeable to the Senate to hear me, I shall ask to submit some remarks upon the bill. Meanwhile I move that the bill lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I introduce a bill which I ask may be read the first time by its title and the second time at length.

The bill (S. 1408) to promote the foreign trade of the United States and encourage the increase of the American merchant marine was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

A bill to promote the foreign trade of the United States and encourage the increase of the American merchant marine.

Whereas prior to 1855 the traffic between the United States and foreign countries was chiefly carried on by American vessels; and

Whereas since that time the increase in such traffic has been enormous, yet the amount carried by American vessels has actually diminished; and

Whereas this diversion of traffic to foreign vessels is due to a variety of causes which can not be overcome by unaided individual effort; and

Whereas the existence of a large and effective merchant marine, under its own flag and manned by trained seamen, always available for naval operations, is essential to the safety and the highest commercial growth and prosperity of a nation; and

Whereas all the important commercial nations of the world have found it necessary to extend Government aid in some form to develop and protect their ocean carrying trade; and

Whereas the revival of the American ocean carrying trade will open a much-needed field of employment to many, and, by providing cheap and regular transportation to markets not now so reached, will enlarge the demand for the excess products of all American industries: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to vessels having an American register and conforming to the classifications hereinafter given, and which shall be owned and controlled by American citizens or associations thereof, or by corporations formed under United States law or under the laws of any of the States.

SEC. 2. That no vessel shall be entitled to the benefit of this act unless it belongs to one of the following classes, and is or shall, until other regulations are provided by law, be built in conformity with rules equal to the British Lloyds or French Bureau Veritas:

CLASS 1.

SECTION A. Sailing vessels of metal or wood, or partly of both, engaged in freight traffic only, and of not less than 1,000 tons United States gross register measurement.

SEC. B. Vessels of metal or wood, or partly of both, propelled by steam, or some form of power applied through machinery, and engaged in freight traffic only, and of not less than 1,500 tons United States gross register measurement.

CLASS 2.

SECTION A. Vessels of metal or wood, or partly of both, propelled by steam, or some form of power applied through machinery, and engaged in both freight and passenger traffic, having an average sea speed of not less than 10 knots per hour, and of not less than 1,500 tons United States gross register measurement.

SEC. B. Vessels similar to those described in section A of class 2, but having an average sea speed of not less than 14 knots per hour, of not less than 3,000 tons United States gross register measurement, and a first-class cabin capacity for not less than 100 persons.

SEC. C. Vessels similar to those described in section B of class 2, but having an average sea speed of not less than 18 knots per hour, and of not less than 4,000 tons United States gross register measurement, and a first-class cabin capacity for not less than two hundred persons.

SEC. 3. That every such vessel shall be entitled to and shall receive from the Secretary of the Treasury the respective rates of compensation hereinafter described, and shall, as part consideration therefor, carry, without further charge, whatever mail matter shall be delivered to the said vessel, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General shall from time to time prescribe: Provided, however, That the said vessel shall only be required to take mail matter received at the ports of the United States from which it clears to the foreign ports at which it expects to call, and which may be received at said foreign ports and carried to the port or ports of its destination. As a further consideration the United States Government shall have the right to purchase or charter any such vessel for a price or sum to be fixed by agreement between the owners and the Secretary of the Department purchasing or chartering said vessel; and in case of disagreement to be fixed by two appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, with power in said appraisers to choose a third in case of disagreement.

SEC. 4. That the rates of compensation shall be paid as follows: For each nautical mile run between a port of the United States and any foreign port, including both the outward and inward passage, the mileage between the ports visited shall be computed by the shortest routes through the water by great circle sailing, and then shall be paid at the end of each such voyage:

Class 1, section A, for each 100 tons United States gross register measurement, 4 cents.

Class 1, section B, for each 100 tons United States gross register measurement, 4 cents.

Class 2, section A, for each 100 tons United States gross register measurement, 4.4 cents.

Class 2, section B, for each 100 tons United States gross register measurement, 4.8 cents.

Class 2, section C, for each 100 tons United States gross register measurement, 5.3 cents.

SEC. 5. That all payments shall be made upon vouchers, with forms of accounts and verifications and under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for all voyages beginning after January 1, 1887; and whatever moneys may be needed to make such payments are hereby appropriated. No payments for ocean postal services shall be made after January 1, 1887, to any vessel other than those covered by this act, excepting in cases where and only so long as such vessels can not give a service as efficient as that given by other vessels. Tables of great circle distances shall be computed by the Naval Observatory and furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall publish them and furnish them to the collectors of the various ports of entry of the United States for the use of vessel owners and masters, and they shall be used in computing all dues under this act.

SEC. 6. That after January 1, 1905, the rates of compensation named in the fourth section hereof shall be reduced annually by 10 per centum of said rates, so that by January 1, 1915, such compensation shall entirely cease.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1427) to provide for the erection of a public building in Springfield, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1428) for the relief of Samuel Ceas, of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1429) for the relief of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That the papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate in the case of William Tabb be withdrawn and filed with the Committee on Claims, in connection with the bill for his relief.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the claim of the heirs of James Sinclair for land and damage done thereto in Washington Territory be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. COLQUITT, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of J. W. Walter be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PURIFICATION OF WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to ascertain the advisability and practicability of providing the water supply of the capital with filters and other appliances for cleansing and purifying the water, and to report the result of his inquiries, together with plans and estimates of the cost and application of the same.

CAPRON JAPANESE COLLECTION.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of purchasing for the Government the collection of Japanese specimens, works, and objects of art made by the late General Horace Capron during a long actual residence in Japan, and left by him, in his lifetime, on deposit in the Smithsonian Institution, and that said committee shall report on the subject by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that a descriptive catalogue of the collection may be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection it will be so referred.

ONE AND TWO DOLLAR NOTES.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, United States notes of a less denomination than $5 have practically disappeared from circulation, to the great inconvenience of all who have small daily transactions or are engaged in retail trade. I ascertained by examination of the statutes on this subject that the denomination of United States notes issued is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the single limitation that notes of a less denomination than $1 shall not be issued. I understand that these smaller notes have been withdrawn from circulation and practically retired, for the purpose of forcing silver into circulation, and thereby attempting to render it unpopular with the people. I suppose that if all notes under the denomination of $50 were withdrawn, the result would be to force gold into circulation, but no effort of that kind appears to have been made.

My impression is that the people of this country, while they want gold and silver as a basis of circulation, do not desire to carry either in their pockets, and that they desire above all other things, so far as their currency and circulating medium are concerned, the restoration of the smaller United States notes; and inasmuch as they pay all the money that is in the Treasury from their own resources and are the owners of whatever currency there may be in the country, I do not understand why their wish should not be gratified. For the purpose of having an inquiry made upon this subject, I offer the following resolution, that I ask may be adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the propriety of such an amendment to section 3571 Revised Statutes as may be necessary to require the issue of United States notes of the denomination of one and two dollars.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas, in reply to a resolution passed by the Senate February 29, 1884, inquiring as to the amount of wheat, corn, rye, and cotton produced and consumed in, imported into, and exported from the different countries with which this country holds commercial intercourse, &c., under date of April 21, 1884, the Secretary of State said:

"Whether the present depressed condition of the wheat trade of Europe is occasioned by the several countries drawing upon their reserve stock for local economic reasons or to affect prices or legislation or public opinion, or for some other cause, can not be asserted with certainty, but this important fact remains, that the calculations and estimates herewith submitted prove, as far as statistics can prove under the circumstances, that the stock of wheat on hand in Europe at the close of 1883 did not materially differ from the stock on hand at the close of the previous year; that the wants of Europe are as imperative and as great as they were in 1883, and that the demands upon the United States should naturally be as great, at least, as they were in 1883. How long Europe may or can draw upon her reserve stock or what the exact considerations are which control the several countries in this regard, especially the United Kingdom—which may be said to regulate the wheat markets of the world—time alone can develop.

"The most liberal allowance for the wheat output necessary to the world's consumption shows that the United States should be drawn upon during the present year for 188,000,000 bushels, in round numbers, against 187,000,000 bushels from all other wheat-growing countries. It thus appears that the United States supplies one-half of all the foreign wheat consumed by the several countries, and that, instead of being controlled by, we should be able to control foreign markets."

And whereas said depression still continues: Therefore,

Resolved, That said Secretary be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the Senate, at his earliest convenience, the amount in bushels of said cereals respectively, and in pounds of cotton produced and consumed, imported into, and exported from each of said countries during the years 1884 and 1885, as compared with like amounts during the three years preceding said dates. The surplus amount of said products now on hand in foreign countries to meet usual demands until September 1, 1886; the amount likely to be required by importing countries before said date, with the average acreage of wheat now in the ground in foreign countries for the crop of 1886, each in detail. Also whether later advices confirm the figures and opinions contained in said report, and whether the causes therein referred to, as reprinted in this resolution, or increased production, or diminished consumption of food and clothing by the people, or decrease in population, or lack of money to employ labor and handle property, or, so far as his official information extends, what are the reasons which cause the continued unprecedented depression in prices for said products in this country and throughout the world.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to its present consideration, the resolution will be printed and lie over.

BILLS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. MAHONE. I desire to give notice at this time that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to consider the public buildings bills that are now on the Calendar.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call up the measure that I mentioned the other evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent and other resolutions are still in order.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1885, with its appendices, be printed in the usual octavo form, but that the eight accompanying memoirs be printed in quarto form, and that 4,500 additional copies of the report and memoirs be printed; of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the National Academy of Sciences.

REPORT ON ORDNANCE AND WAR SHIPS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask a reconsideration of the reference of the resolution for printing the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships. I desire to amend the resolution by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now desire to strike out so much of the resolution as orders the printing of the usual number, that being ordered by the rules anyhow, and to leave that in might delay the work until the House should concur in the passage of the resolution. I move to strike out of it so much as orders the printing of the usual number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will be reported.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is simply to strike out the words ordering the printing of the usual number.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the words "the usual number of;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships be printed; 1,000 copies each for the War and Navy Departments, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution in this form will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

SILVER DEPOSITS AT SUBTREASURIES.

Mr. EUSTIS. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire,

First. Whether it has been the custom for the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to receive deposits of standard silver dollars from shippers of said coin and to issue to their correspondents at New Orleans receipts subject to count and to issue silver certificates after the count of said dollars so deposited has been made, and whether said custom, if it has prevailed, has been changed by the instructions of the Treasurer of the United States and the reasons therefor; also whether the said custom is now in force as regards any subtreasury of the United States.

Second. Whether there has been and is now an adequate clerical force at the subtreasury at New Orleans to perform the duties of that office so that holders desiring to deposit standard silver dollars under the authority of law may deposit them and receive therefor certificates without delay, and if such clerical force is insufficient, to report to the Senate what increase of said force should be made to secure a prompt execution of the law.

That said committee are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire, Mr. President, to state the reasons why I offer the resolution. The cashier of a national bank at New Orleans has written me a letter in which he states that shipments of silver dollars made by banks in the interior to correspondents in New Orleans have been refused on deposit at the subtreasury in New Orleans, and that the refusal of the subtreasury to receive on deposit the silver dollars so shipped had been approved by the Treasurer of the United States. Not desiring to occupy unnecessarily the time of the Senate, I ask that this letter be printed in full as part of my remarks, but I wish to call attention——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. EUSTIS. But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this passage in the letter——

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the letter read at length.

Mr. EUSTIS. I have no objection to its being read. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, January 25.

DEAR SIR: In view of your position on the silver question and the probability that Congress will ratify your opinions by their official action, it seems important that all impediments to the free use of silver and its unrestricted movement should be avoided so far as possible, and every portion of the country be provided with all possible facilities for giving silver circulation a fair test without the creation of prejudices against it from extrinsic causes.

That such a prejudice is growing up against it in this section is due to a cause that is within the easy power of Congress to remove, and I deem it due to your position and your views to state it frankly. As you are doubtless well aware, the States of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Mississippi draw large quantities of standard dollars from the Treasury during the fall and early winter, in exchange for which the Treasury receives gold or its equivalent later in the season. The silver dollars having performed their part in moving the crops of cotton, rice, and sugar to market, seek to return to the Treasury until further needed in commerce and agriculture.

In lieu of the silver thus returned to the Treasury the holders do not ask back the gold they originally paid for it, but simply silver certificates for the amounts deposited. I am told that it has been the custom at all the subtreasuries to receive from country banks shipments of standard dollars, the certificates for which were delivered to the shipper's correspondent in the subtreasury city. I know this has been the case in New York, and last year in New Orleans also, besides which the banks of this city could deposit their surplus silver and receive certificates in the same manner.

This year, however, the subtreasury at this point declines to receive silver from the country banks, though the latter write me that this facility is still accorded them by other subtreasuries. In this the Treasurer of the United States sustains our assistant treasurer, and I therefore presume he is right as a matter of law. But the subtreasurer virtually refuses to receive it from depositors in this city also; that is to say, he so limits the amount and receives it so seldom that it is practically a refusal. I appreciate the subtreasurer's reason, which is that he has not an adequate clerical force to do the work that would fall upon his office should he receive deposits of these dollars as freely as offered. But this evil can be easily remedied by Congress granting him one or two more employés. This would but slightly increase the expenses of the office, but would be of immense benefit to the people by facilitating the free movement of silver, and when the people find that their surplus silver can be promptly converted into paper representatives of the coin at need they will be more likely to receive the coin freely and cheerfully than they will now that it is liable to become a dead weight of metal upon their hands.

It is becoming common for us to receive letters from country banks urging us to let them ship us standard dollars. To these we returned affirmative answers so long as we had room in our vaults to store it; but finally the point was reached where we could not receive further shipments unless the Treasury would receive more freely from us. The country banks thus clogged become naturally prejudiced against silver, and the longer the blockade continues the more likely they are to be confirmed in this feeling and to disseminate the infection to their customers. I commend this whole matter to you as one in which you are interested, and ask your early consideration.

Very respectfully, yours,

T. R. ROACH, Cashier.

Hon. JAMES B. EUSTIS,
United States Senate, Washington.

Mr. EUSTIS. I also ask, Mr. President, that Executive Document No. 58, which contains the answer of the Treasurer to a resolution that I offered calling for the instructions given to the assistant treasurer on the subject, be printed as part of my remarks, so that the statement I made may stand either supported or corrected by the evidence furnished by the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Senate Executive Document No. 58, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, is as follows:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of January 29, 1886, papers relating to certain instructions to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans.

February 2, 1886, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 2, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution dated January 29, 1886, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate whether any instructions have been issued to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to refuse to receive silver dollars on deposit and issue therefor certificates, or whether he has been instructed to receive only a limited amount of said silver dollars, and if such instructions have been issued, to inform the Senate the reasons upon which they are based,"

and in reply, to inclose herewith copy of report in the matter, dated 1st instant, with its inclosures, containing the information desired, from the Treasurer of the United States, to whom the resolution had been referred.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 1, 1886.

SIR: In the matter of the resolution of the Senate, dated January 29, 1886, referred by you to this office, calling for information as to instructions issued to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans relating to the exchange of standard silver dollars for silver certificates, I beg to submit herewith copies of the correspondence bearing on this subject, which has passed between this office, the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, and the State National Bank of that city, namely:

Nos. 1 and 3. Letters to assistant treasurer, dated June 1, 1885, and January 7, 1886.

No. 2. Letter from assistant treasurer, dated January 2, 1886.

Nos. 4 and 6. Letters from State National Bank, New Orleans, dated January 2 and January 11, 1886.

Nos. 5 and 7. Letters to State National Bank, New Orleans, dated January 7 and January 14, 1886.

As will appear from this correspondence, no instructions have been given the assistant treasurer which could be construed as interfering with the proper execution of the law requiring the issue of silver certificates to parties depositing standard silver dollars. When it became apparent, from the report of the committee sent last May to count the funds and examine the books of the subtreasury in New Orleans that the force employed, owing to the large increase of duties resulting from numerous deposits of postal funds by postmasters, from receipts of standard silver dollars and mutilated notes for redemption, and from the issue of gold, silver, and legal-tender certificates, was wholly inadequate to cope with the labor imposed upon it, and that measures must be adopted to relieve it, as far as practicable, and to secure strict accountability of officers and employés charged with the handling of moneys, instructions were issued to forward, as rapidly as possible, to this office, without assortment, all legal-tender and national-bank notes, and to accept, for exchange into certificates, no more silver dollars in any one day than could be counted and verified, with this qualification, however, that deposits so refused should be given preference on the following day.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

No. 1.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, June 1, 1885.

SIR: The report of the committee sent to examine your accounts as assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans, La., has been made to the Department, and I regret that they have been compelled to find fault with its management while under your care, though excusing in part its defects, for the following reasons: That the clerical force is small, the cashier in poor health, and the receipts of standard silver dollars and mutilated notes for redemption are often too large to be disposed of on the day of receipt.

These facts should have been communicated to this office, and not have been permitted to exist without some effort on your part to obtain relief.

You would have been justified in declining to accept deposits beyond the capacity of your office to handle, and when the complaints which would have resulted from pursuing this course had been brought to the attention of this office, some other remedy would have been found than imposing burdens upon the clerks in your employment to such an extent that they have not been able to attend to their ordinary duties or keep the cash and other accounts in that order in which every well-regulated office of the Government should be kept, and such as an officer zealous in the discharge of his duties should make it his constant endeavor to secure.

You have been instructed by telegraph to return the mutilated notes now in your charge to this office without assortment, and may hereafter continue this practice until further instructions, taking care to notify the parties from whom you receive such notes that they are taken subject to such count and correction. It would be well to preserve the original straps and envelopes and forward the packages in their condition when received, though you may, if you have the time, count and verify the amount, merely in order to expedite payment for such deposit without assorting the same.

If this method does not afford the desired relief, inform this Department as soon as possible what steps are practicable in this direction. I advise, further, that you accept no deposit of silver dollars beyond your capacity to handle in any one day, and that you give notice to the banks to that effect. Deposits so refused may be given preference on the following day.

I should further recommend that you open accounts on your books to be known as "Redemption of minor coins," "Redemption of fractional silver," "Redemption of mutilated notes and fractional currency," "Exchange of standard silver dollars," and include in your cash each day the amount received.

You will, in addition, carry no vouchers in your cash, and a less amount of it in your cashier's hands. This can be effected by transferring to your storage vault fractional silver and standard silver dollars in amounts, after verification, of any $20,000. The mode of shipment of mutilated money will also tend to lessen this item.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. P. F. HERWIG,
Assistant Treasurer United States, New Orleans, La.

No. 2.

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
New Orleans, La., January 2, 1886.

SIR: Within the past two days I have received from the First National Bank of Memphis, Tenn., the Bank of Commerce, same place, and the Waco State Bank, of Waco, Tex., respectively, letters advising that they had shipped by express to this office silver dollars amounting in the aggregate to $25,000, to be received on account of the State National Bank of this city.

According to my understanding of the duties and functions of this office, I have assumed that, without authorizing instructions from the Department office, it is not a depository or intermediary in the matter of shipments from one bank to another—a transaction which might involve new responsibilities and accounts. I have therefore declined to receive these shipments from the express company and give the required receipt therefor, having previously notified the State Bank of my intended action in the premises. The cashier of the bank insists that their method, as above, is customary and proper; and I beg leave to report the matter for information, and also for instructions, if I have misjudged my duty therein.

The practical result of such a method, outside of the view I have ventured to express about it, would be to encumber this office with a bulk of silver dollars much beyond its capacity, with present force, to count and redeem and handle also (for storage in vaults below or shipment) with ordinary expedition, and prevent us from controlling the redemption deposits of the various banks within the limit of our working capacity, which discretion, I am informed, has been heretofore granted in the time of my predecessor.

Very respectfully,

SAM'L FLOWER,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

Hon. C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, January 7, 1886.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 2d instant, concerning shipments by certain banks of standard silver dollars to your office, for returns (after count) in silver certificates to their New Orleans correspondent, I beg to state that your action declining to receive such shipments is approved. No reason appears why the Treasury should receive deposits other than on account of the Government.

Very respectfully,

J. W. WHELPLEY,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

Hon. SAMUEL FLOWER,
Assistant Treasurer United States, New Orleans, La.

No. 4.

STATE NATIONAL BANK, New Orleans, January 2, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Quite a number of our correspondents in Texas, Mississippi, Tennessee, &c., desire to arrange some method by which they may deposit with the subtreasury at New Orleans standard dollars for redemption, the proceeds, in silver certificates, to be paid over to us, after count, for their credit.

This method of redemption has heretofore been customary, and thinking it was a matter of course, several banks during the present week have shipped silver dollars to the treasury for redemption in this manner. But the assistant treasurer has refused to receive it, assigning two grounds, first, that it would make the treasury the intermediary between banks, and second, that he is not prepared to handle promptly the large amount of silver which would probably come in on him for redemption under this method.

To his first reason I confess I do not see much force, for if the country banks have the privilege of depositing silver and taking in lieu silver certificates it seems less trouble for him to issue his receipt for silver, "subject to count," and redeem these receipts from us at his leisure, than to deal directly with the depositing banks. This would enable him to handle the silver conveniently, at a minimum of trouble to his office.

There may be more force in the second objection, namely: The lack of clerks to attend to this class of business; but, if he has the same force that his predecessor had last winter (when the conversion of standard dollars into silver certificates was done quite largely), he should be able to accommodate the public equally as well as was done by Assistant Treasurer Herwig.

I should thank you greatly if you could arrange some plan by which the country banks could be accommodated in this matter, as I fear silver will, if non-convertible, drive both gold and greenbacks from circulation and greatly impair the circulating medium of this section at least.

Very respectfully,

T. R. ROACH, C.

Treasurer United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to yours of the 2d instant in regard to shipments of standard silver dollars from your correspondents to the subtreasury in your city, to be paid for to your bank, after count, I beg to inform you that the action of the assistant treasurer declining to receive such deposits is approved by this office.

Very respectfully,

STATE NATIONAL BANK, New Orleans, January 11, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 7th instant, advising us that you approve the action of Assistant Treasurer Flower in declining to receive deposits of standard dollars from our correspondents, the proceeds to be paid over to us after count.

Permit me to trouble you once more with this request, viz: Are we entitled to deposit, ourselves, standard dollars with the assistant treasurer and, after count, to receive silver certificates therefor?

We are being overflowed with silver dollars, and unless we can exchange them at the Treasury for silver certificates it looks as though silver would soon be our only circulating medium.

Very respectfully,

T. R. ROACH, C.

Hon. J. W. WHELPLEY,

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, January 14, 1886.

SIR: Referring to your inquiry of the 11th instant, I beg to say that in exchange for standard silver dollars deposited by your bank with the assistant treasurer in your city, silver certificates will be furnished you, after count and certification, by that officer.

Very respectfully,

J. W. WHELPLEY,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

The CASHIER,
State National Bank, New Orleans, La.

Mr. EUSTIS. Inasmuch as the only subtreasury south of Baltimore is located in the city of New Orleans, and it is the subtreasury through which the business coming from the States of Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, Alabama, and so on is done—I am not able to state how far it transacts business for other Western States—the condition of that office becomes a very serious question, and I must state in all frankness that the revelation which has been disclosed by a private citizen, and not by any official of the Government, as to the condition of that office is perfectly amazing. We have here a grave complaint made by the cashier of a national bank. I do not know whether he be a silver or an anti-silver man. After correspondence with the assistant treasurer at New Orleans and with the Treasurer himself, after repeated and most earnest efforts on his part to have the silver dollars which had been shipped to his bank from Texas and other States deposited in the subtreasury according to law, he tells us in fact and effect that an embargo has been laid against silver dollars as regards the subtreasury of the United States in the city of New Orleans, and that the law in favor of the circulation and transmission and deposit of the silver dollars has been practically suspended, so far as any action on the part of the Government is concerned. What is the consequence? What is the result? Clearly, as the banks and individuals who have these silver dollars have not the means and facilities for controlling their own deposits, as this gentleman expresses it, a strong prejudice in that whole section of the country is being created against the silver dollar.

I have received communications from another cashier of a bank, in which he gives the startling information that country merchants in the interior of those States are to-day refusing to receive silver dollars unless it be at a discount. I believe the Senator from Texas will support me in the statement that he has received similar information from his State as to the result of this blockade of silver at the subtreasury in New Orleans.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator with his permission. If he is familiar with the law, I ask whether the law makes it the duty of the subtreasurer to receive funds of private individuals on deposit?

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me, I have a copy of the law in my hand and will read the clause:

Section 3——

Mr. CHACE. I did not hear the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I asked the Senator from Louisiana whether the law made it the duty of the subtreasurers to receive on deposit the funds of private individuals.

Mr. EUSTIS. Holders of silver dollars under the law have a right to deposit them.

Mr. COKE. I will read the clause of the law, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. That any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than ten dollars, and receive therefor certificates of not less than ten dollars each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and, when so received, may be reissued.

That is the third section of the act of 1878.

Mr. CHACE. Does the Senator from Louisiana say that the people of Texas refuse to receive the silver dollars?

Mr. EUSTIS. I said that in consequence of the refusal of the subtreasury to receive these shipments of silver from the banks in the interior, as has been the custom heretofore, there is a prejudice being created against silver in the interior.

Mr. CHACE. I understood the Senator to say that merchants would not receive silver dollars for moneys due them.

Mr. EUSTIS. I stated that I had received information from the cashier of a bank that merchants in the interior refused to receive silver dollars except at a discount.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator means to say they refuse to sell merchandise for silver dollars. Of course they can not refuse to receive them if tendered in settlement of debts.

Mr. EUSTIS. I suppose they fix a price on their merchandise which amounts to charging a discount on the silver. I am not a merchant, but I suppose that is the way it is done.

Mr. COKE. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana if this was not attributed by his informant to this action of the Treasury Department?

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose or intention to do any injustice to any official of the Government. I am very frank to state that the assistant treasurer at New Orleans places his denial to receive this silver so shipped upon two grounds: first, that the subtreasury should not be made an intermediary between banks; and, second, that he has not clerical force sufficient to handle the amount of silver which might be brought in for deposit.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator permit me ask him whether there has been any diminution of the clerical force of the office since the 4th of March last?

Mr. EUSTIS. I am not aware that there has been.

What I say is that it has been the custom for banks in the interior to ship silver dollars to the subtreasury, the money being received subject to count, and receipts being issued to the correspondents in New Orleans; and that custom has been suddenly changed and abandoned, and this cashier says in this letter that he has information from the banks which made the shipments that that custom still prevails at the subtreasury in New York. Now, inasmuch as that custom has prevailed and it is not violative of law, and inasmuch as the Government of the United States, so far as we know, has never lost a single dollar or incurred any greater responsibility by reason of that custom, and if that custom does prevail at the subtreasury in New York, why has it been changed with reference to the subtreasury in the city of New Orleans?

It was only on the 2d of January, 1886, so far as I know, that any one has ever heard of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans refusing to recognize this mode of doing business, refusing to receive these shipments of silver dollars, as he did on that day a shipment of $25,000 from the Memphis (Tenn.) Bank of Commerce, and the Waco State Bank, of Waco, Tex.; and it is that point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Committee on Finance; for if that statement should be substantiated by the evidence, if it should be proved that that custom had prevailed, if it should be proved that that custom does yet prevail with reference to the subtreasuries in New York and other places, then I say that that official who has approved of the change of that custom in the city of New Orleans exposes himself to very grave suspicions, to say the least, with reference to his hostility and his secret warfare against the silver dollar.

We know that the Treasury of the United States has great power; we know that its officials have great power; we know that in many cases merely by interpretation and construction of the law they can practically repeal or nullify a law of Congress. We know that by evasion and by indirection and by simulation of fulfilling the requirements of the law, even in reference to this financial question, they have the power to impede and obstruct and destroy and defeat the purpose of the law itself. And while I do not intend to make any accusation or charge in advance of the proof, while I am willing to give this official, the Treasurer of the United States, the benefit of the doubt, yet I must say that if the evidence should disclose that he has approved this official act of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, and has not given such instructions to the assistant treasurers in other cities, then he would expose himself to the just charge and accusation that in those Southern States which have dealings with the subtreasury at New Orleans the only purpose and the only design was to create a prejudice against the silver dollar among the people.

Now, sir, with reference to the clerical force: On the 1st of June, 1885, when Mr. Herwig was assistant treasurer at New Orleans, the Treasurer reprimanded, if I may use the expression, the then assistant treasurer for not informing his Department that he had not an adequate clerical force to discharge the duties of that office. That was the 1st of June, 1885, and yet on the 2d of January, 1886, we still hear that same complaint, that there is not a sufficient clerical force in order to discharge the duties of this office so far as concerns receiving the proposed deposits of silver dollars and issuing mere receipts, subject to count, or silver certificates; and that is one of the reasons given by the assistant treasurer for refusing this very deposit of $25,000 from the State of Tennessee and the State of Texas.

Now I would ask if in June, 1885, the clerical force of that office was not sufficient, and if it be true that on the 2d of January, 1886, and to-day the clerical force is not sufficient, was it not clearly the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to report that important fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, in order that he should call the attention of Congress to the insufficiency and inadequacy of the clerical force at the subtreasury in New Orleans? How can it be explained?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me right here for a question, because I apprehend the Senator's remarks are creating a very unfair impression with respect to the whole matter, not intentionally by any means; I do not mean that. The letter of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to which he has referred goes on to state a case on page 3, letter No. 2, of Executive Document No. 58, in which a shipment of silver dollars to the amount of $25,000 had been sent from the Waco State Bank of Waco, Tex., to the credit of the State National Bank of the city of New Orleans. Now I wish to know if it is a part of the duty of any of the assistant treasurers of the United States or of the Treasurer of the United States to furnish a place of deposit for funds belonging to State banks or national banks? In this case the money was sent through an express company and a receipt was demanded, requiring of the Government a sufficient clerical force to count the money and receipt to the express company for $25,000 received from the Waco bank to the credit of the State National Bank of New Orleans. It is nowhere claimed or urged in the letter that certificates were not issued. Certificates were not asked for, so far as that letter goes.

Mr. EUSTIS. Why were silver dollars refused to be received that were sent from Memphis?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. Flower either conceals that fact or he has been entirely right in not permitting the subtreasury of the United States to be used as a place of deposit for banks. Perhaps the subtreasury was already overflowing with silver dollars; perhaps he had no place of deposit for them. He says they have not sufficient clerical force; and I do submit to the Senator that the use of the subtreasuries of the United States as places of deposit for funds belonging to national banks, requiring receipts to be given to express companies and to every mode of conveyence by which silver dollars can be conveyed there, is asking the United States Government to go outside of its proper functions.

Mr. EUSTIS. I am not asking the United States Government to do any such thing. I am surprised that the Senator from New Jersey should so misapprehend what I have said and the letter which has been read as to suppose for an instant that either the cashier of this bank or myself claim that any one who has surplus dollars can go and deposit them in the subtreasury of the United States whenever he chooses and get silver certificates.

M. MCPHERSON. Is not that actually the case?

Mr. EUSTIS. This whole letter is with reference to this complication that has arisen. Here is what the gentleman says:

In lieu of the silver thus returned to the Treasury the holders do not ask back the gold they originally paid for it, but simply silver certificates for the amounts deposited. I am told that it has been the custom at all the subtreasuries to receive from country banks shipments of standard dollars, the certificates for which were delivered to the shipper's correspondent in the subtreasury city.

That is with reference to this very matter. The trouble is that the assistant treasurer will not issue the silver certificates to the correspondent in New Orleans of the shipper of the silver.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is not that in violation of law?

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not see anything in the law which makes such an act a violation of the law. What I do claim is that I am informed that it has been the custom at the subtreasury in New Orleans to have this mode of deposit made, as was offered to be made when it was refused, and I am also informed that it is the custom now of the subtreasury at New York and at other places; and when, in the face of this shipment and other shipments, this sudden order is issued to these banks and capitalists, and these instructions are given to change that custom, I want to know the reason why. Certainly if it is a custom that has prevailed, and it is a custom that has been acquiesced in by the Treasury Department, by the officials of the Treasury, and by the shippers of silver dollars, and if it is a custom which does not violate the law and which has imposed no additional responsibility and inflicted no possible loss upon the Government of the United States, there must be some reason—and it may be a very secret one; I do not know—but there must be some reason why the custom has been changed by which all these facilities which have been heretofore afforded to the shippers of silver coin are suddenly withdrawn, and the consequence and the result is that these people do not know what to do with their silver dollars, and, as this gentleman says, a strong prejudice is being created against the silver dollars.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me a moment?

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the case is really a great deal stronger than the Senator from Louisiana delineates it under the law. If I understood the Senator from New Jersey correctly, he inquired why it was that the Treasury of the United States should be called upon to act as a depository for the holders of silver coin, either for banks or for corporations or for private holders.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have the Senator from Kansas yield to me a moment to state the question exactly as I presented it.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. It was simply this, that the Treasury of the United States should not be expected to be an intermediary, a place of deposit, so to speak, for silver dollars sent by one bank to another, to be held there until such time as the latter bank should choose to call for it, and a receipt given by the Treasury requiring it to be responsible on a count of the money.

Mr. INGALLS. If I can read the English language, and am capable of understanding section 3 of chapter 20 of the laws of the United States, an act that was passed over the veto of the President on the 28th of February, 1878, it is not the concern of the Treasurer of the United States, nor of any assistant treasurer of the United States, to inquire for what purpose or in what capacity the holder of silver dollars in excess of the number of ten takes them for deposit and asks that a silver certificate may be issued thereon. Let me read it:

That any holder of the coin—

No matter in what capacity he may hold it; any holder of the coin, whether he may be a national banker through whom it is passing in transit or anybody else—

any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States—

Within which category I understand this officer at New Orleans comes—in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor certificates of not less than $10 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes.

That is followed by a declaration as to the purpose for which that coin shall be held. And if the statement that is made by the Senator from Louisiana is verified by the facts, then, sir, he does wrong to characterize this as a departure from custom, he does wrong when he says that there has been merely a suspension of the custom that has been hitherto and is still observed at other assistant treasuries; he should say that there has been a positive, deliberate, and willful violation of law.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator from Louisiana will yield to me a moment, I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a single question before he sits down.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no right to interfere with the Senator from Louisiana. My remarks were merely an interpolation.

Mr. McPHERSON. The criticism which I made upon the statement of the Senator from Lousiana was this, that the case which was answered by Mr. Flower, the assistant treasurer of the United States, was not one of the kind to which the Senator referred, because it does not answer that particular case to which the Senator has referred. He answers the case of a deposit of silver dollars to the credit of a national bank in the city of New Orleans, receipts being demanded for money deposited, but there was no demand as I understand, and none appears in the statement, for certificates, but this money was to be turned over subsequently to the State National Bank of New Orleans, having been sent in by the Waco National Bank.

Now I want to ask the Senator from Louisiana this question: The Waco bank sent in $25,000 to the subtreasury to be received later by the State National Bank of Louisiana; but was there any right whatever on the part of either bank to expect the Government to make a transfer of these silver dollars when no demand was made for certificates?

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator from New Jersey entirely misconceives the matter as to what these shippers desired or intended to have in return for their silver certificates. He would convey the idea that this was merely an irregular deposit of some silver that somebody had.

Mr. McPHERSON. It was a case of intermediate storage for the accommodation of a bank.

Mr. EUSTIS. The money was shipped directly to the subtreasury, and one of the reasons given by the assistant treasurer for not receiving it was—

The practical result of such a method, outside of the view I have ventured to express about it, would be to encumber this office with a bulk of silver dollars much beyond its capacity, with present force, to count and redeem and handle.

No other objection.

Mr. DAWES. Was this shipment to the subtreasury accompanied with a demand for statute certificates?

Mr. McPHERSON. No.

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not know whether it was or not.

Mr. DAWES. The inquiry which I made was to ascertain what was the duty imposed on the subtreasurer by the law. I understand that where silver is shipped to him he is to give a statute certificate. If the demand upon him in this case was to give such a statute certificate he has violated the law in declining to give it, but if it was to give an ordinary certificate for that money, I doubt whether he was required to do it.

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator will understand that when 25,000 silver dollars are deposited it takes considerable time to count that amount of money.

Mr. DAWES. But it does not take any time to let the subtreasurer know what it is deposited for.

Mr. EUSTIS. Therefore the assistant treasurer issues a receipt subject to count; that is to say, the deposit is made, the assistant treasurer issues a receipt subject to count, which means that as soon as the dollars are counted and the amount verified then he issues the silver certificates authorized by law.

Mr. DAWES. There is no question if the purpose of deposit was to obtain certificates any intermediate arrangement that would be necessary to ascertain the amount would be carried along with the provisions of law; but if the deposit was of money there to be kept for another bank, it would not come within the law.

Mr. GORMAN. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts I will say that in the letter of the assistant treasurer dated the 2d of January, 1886, he says:

Within the past two days I have received from the First National Bank of Memphis, Tenn., the Bank of Commerce, same place, and the Waco State Bank, of Waco, Tex., respectively, letters advising that they had shipped by express to this office silver dollars amounting in the aggregate to $25,000, to be received on account of the State National Bank of this city.

He reports to the Treasurer that there was an absence of a demand for certificates, and only a request to hold the silver dollars for the convenience of the bank, which he declined to do.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the Senator from Louisiana upon the provision of the law that required him to do that.

Mr. EUSTIS. I did not commit myself on that question; what I did state was that whether the law required it or not, it had been the custom and was now the custom with reference to the subtreasury at New York, and the purpose of my urging was that if it had been the custom and was now the custom with reference to other subtreasuries, why has the custom been changed with regard to the subtreasury at New Orleans?

Mr. DAWES. So the Senator made a distinction between custom and law, which he found necessary to conform to the facts; and therefore it was a very proper distinction, which the Senator from Kansas overlooked when he charged it to be more than a violation of custom, a violation of law. The Senator from Louisiana did well to adhere to the words "violation of custom" rather than of law.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the Senator desires my opinion on the question, I will give it. I believe it is the universal law that whatever an individual may do by himself he has the right to do by another; and if a bank in the interior ships silver dollars directly to the subtreasury with instructions that that shipment is made to be received on account of the State National Bank of New Orleans, I do not see what possible objection there can be to the receipt, or to silver certificates, being given to the State National Bank of New Orleans instead of to the bank in the interior. It was a mere direction of the depositor. The Government of the United States is perfectly secure the moment these dollars are deposited. There is no question about that. They are the security the Government has, and I can not see what risk the Government incurs when the shipper merely directs that the silver certificate shall be given to his agent or correspondent in New Orleans. It is very clear that that custom has prevailed up to this time. According to the statement of the cashier of this bank he is informed by the banks in the interior that that custom does prevail now at the subtreasury in New York.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, to make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VOORHEES in the chair). The Chair is advised that under Rule IX the Calendar is now in order, but that by the usage of the Senate and the courtesy due to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] he is entitled to make a motion at this time. The Chair recognizes him for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Is that to interfere with the Senator from Louisiana?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that it is the purpose of the Senator from New Hampshire to interrupt this discussion.

Mr. LOGAN. At the time the Senator from Louisiana took the floor I could very easily by objection——

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose I have the floor, unless by unanimous consent——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor for the purpose of making a motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Louisiana. Of course I abandoned the floor then, but I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not object to my making a motion now.

Mr. BLAIR. No; I only wish it to be understood that at this hour, having the floor to make a motion, I do not yield the floor so that I may not make it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not ask the Senator to yield the floor. I desire to remind the Senate of a suggestion that I made some three days ago, that I would call up in the morning hour a certain bill in reference to a matter of very great importance to some of the citizens of Chicago. It will take but a few moments. I rose to call up that bill and was recognized by the Chair and yielded for this resolution of the Senator from Louisiana. I supposed it would be through before the hour of 2 arrived, and that then I would have an opportunity of calling up the bill. I now desire to ask, when this is disposed of, that I may be permitted to call up the bill, not to interfere with the Senator from New Hampshire. It will take but a moment to do it, and I desire it, because it is a matter of very great importance and a matter that is being pressed very strongly on me. I shall certainly not interfere with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. My purpose, as I supposed would be understood by the Senate, is to move the consideration of the education bill, so called; and if that motion be adopted I shall have no objection to any arrangement that may seem to be right in the way of the bill being laid aside informally for a very brief period of time in order that the Senator from Illinois may make his motion and have his bill disposed of. I desire to say this, however, that if, as sometimes happens to be the case, an unexpectedly protracted debate should grow out of the consideration of the bill taken up informally, I should reserve the right to object and call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire ask for the present consideration of the motion?

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that my motion be considered now. The proper hour under the rule to make the motion has come.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to give a notice merely. I do not propose to antagonize the Senator from New Hampshire, because I am in favor of his bill, but I give notice that when the bill is disposed of I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the advantage of me by rising a little quicker or being recognized a little quicker than myself, as I desired to give notice that I should immediately after the disposition of the bill of the Senator from New Hamsphire move another bill. I wish to say now that on last Friday at the time of adjournment, when the motion was cut off, I sought to antagonize the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire and thought I should be facilitating the business of the Senate by moving the consideration of the bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State. I believe now that to take it up at the present time would facilitate the business of the Senate for a day or two. I think we should dispose of it if we were to take it up now, immediately following the Dakota discussion, very much quicker than if we take it up at any other time; and I give notice that when the bill moved by the Senator from New Hampshire is disposed of I shall insist on going forward with that. I think the admission of a State into the Union is of quite as much importance as a bankruptcy bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for action on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 194.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire before that is done to place on record in connection with the resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana some correspondence.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me this whole proceeding is a little irregular. I do not understand that one Senator has a right to take another Senator off the floor because the morning hour has expired. No one can call the attention of the Senate to the expiration of the morning hour except the President of the Senate. When the Senator from New Hampshire arose the Senator from Louisiana was on the floor; and I suppose if the irregular proceeding that has taken place had not occurred he would have had the consent of the Senate to finish his remarks. The Senator from New Hampshire could have lost nothing whatever by that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to say in justice to itself that the present incumbent was advised by the President of the Senate to pursue the course that the Chair is now pursuing—to recognize the Senator from New Hampshire as a matter of courtesy due to him from having given notice on Friday last, but that it was not expected that he would take the Senator from Louisiana off the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Then, when this matter comes up, I shall ask that the Senator from Louisiana may be allowed to proceed by common consent, with others who may desire to speak on his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to say further that, as a matter of right, at 2 o'clock the Senator from Louisiana was not longer entitled to the floor, because the Calendar, under Rule IX, was in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire that if the bill which he desires to have taken up shall be taken up, he is quite willing to have it laid aside informally for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Illinois to have a bill passed and enabling the Senator from Louisiana to continue his remarks, which I hope will be done.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not think that any one can claim that I am personally guilty of any discourtesy to any Senator on this floor. As I stated in the beginning, this bill being recognized at 2 o'clock, according to the rule, I shall be willing that it be laid aside informally in any way that seems to be equitable in reference to the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I ask that the bill be laid aside informally, and I will then yield, if no objection is made by Senators, to the Senator from Louisiana to complete his remarks, with the understanding——

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he allow the bill to be reported by title, so that it will be before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; I thought that had been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reported by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I ask that that bill be laid aside informally; and I will state that I shall yield for the purpose of the Senator from Louisiana and others getting through with the discussion of his resolution, with the understanding that I shall then call up the bill I have alluded to, which, I will state to the Senate, will not take more than a few minutes to dispose of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made to that, it will be the order of the Senate. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] has the floor on his resolution, that being regarded as now before the Senate.

SILVER DEPOSITS IN SUBTREASURIES.

Mr. EUSTIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. BLAIR. Do I understand that the Senator from Louisiana has closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has yielded to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that can be done. It was the distinct statement that at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana the Senator from Illinois should move his bill if he desired to do so. I do not wish to have the school bill delayed for an interminable discussion of the silver question. I have no objection to a few remarks, ten, fifteen, or twenty minutes, or to an hour's debate of the silver question, if Senators desire to be heard upon it and it can be brought about informally; but to surrender the school bill to a continued discussion of the silver question I do not wish to do.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly the Senator misunderstands matters. The bill is not surrendered, nor is the time. I only yielded for a few minutes, so that the Senate may be enabled to get through with the discussion of this simple proposition, which will take but a few moments. If it takes long I certainly shall not yield much, but out of courtesy to the Senators engaged in this discussion I thought it was nothing but right that they should finish it. It will take but a few minutes.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that. It could have been easily accomplished by a suggestion of that kind to myself; but the Senator from Colorado indicated no friendliness to the education bill being taken up at this time, and I do not think it is precisely the thing for him to acquire a right to the floor in the indirect manner in which he has obtained it, and if it be subject to objection, I object.

Mr. TELLER. I insist that I am entitled to the floor. I am entitled to it by the consent of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I insist the Senator shall not interrupt what I am saying. I have no objection to the Senator from Colorado being heard for a brief period of time if he desires it. I do not understand that the Senator from Illinois can give him the floor unless by unanimous consent. If the Senator from Colorado desires to speak I have no objection, but I reserve the right to call for the regular order at any time.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire what is the purpose of my honorable friend from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. I intend to submit a few remarks on the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana. I could have got through probably by this time if I had not been interrupted.

Mr. BLAIR. I reserve the right to call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Colorado, in the present condition of business, can only proceed by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood—and if I am not right about it I desire to be corrected—that the Senate, by unanimous consent, agreed that the Senator from Louisiana or the Senator from Colorado should proceed with the discussion of the resolution that was under discussion at the hour of 2 o'clock, and also agreed that when that was disposed of the educational bill should be informally laid aside, not displaced, until the bill that was mentioned by the Senator from Illinois should be considered. It does not displace the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire at all to dispose of these two matters by unanimous consent, and that is what I understood the Senate to have given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, whenever the Senator from New Hampshire calls for the regular order, as he proposes to do, but which I think he will hardly be able to do out of order, it is perfectly proper for me to continue the discussion of this resolution if I see fit to do so. Consequently, practically nothing can be gained by the Senator objecting to my proceeding. He may be sore because I did not vote to make his bill the special order for this morning.

I do not propose to enter into any lengthy and extended discussion of the silver question, but I shall certainly say what I want to say, either upon this resolution or upon some other measures, before I leave the floor. This question is one of quite as much importance to the public as the educational bill and a great deal more so than the bankrupt bill that we have had notice was to be called up. There is not any question that has been presented to the Congress of the United States in the last fifty years of more importance than the question of money to the people of this country. I notice an anxiety on the part of some Senators who do not agree with us to see to it that there shall be but little discussion of it. Are they afraid of daylight upon this question? Are they anxious, especially upon our side of the Senate, that we should come to the rescue of the Department accused, rightfully, too, I say, of a deliberate and willful violation of a statute enacted here by a more than two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress, and which became a law notwithstanding the executive veto?

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] attempted to catechise the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] to say that there had been no violation of the law. There are two phases of this case as found by the Executive Document No. 58, coming from the Treasury Department. First, the bank at New Orleans received $25,000 from certain country banks and proposed to act as the agent of those banks. That certainly brings it within the spirit if not within the letter of the law. There is another phase to it. When the Department at Washington had thus declined to issue certificates, this bank, on the 2d day of January, 1886, sent to the Treasury of the United States at Washington the following letter:

STATE NATIONAL BANK, New Orleans, January 2, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Quite a number of our correspondents in Texas, Mississippi, Tennessee, &c., desire to arrange some method by which they may deposit with the subtreasury at New Orleans standard dollars for redemption, the proceeds, in silver certificates, to be paid over to us, after count, for their credit.

They became the agents of these banks at Memphis, Tenn., and at Waco, Tex., for the purpose of receiving silver certificates. They were the holders within the law of the silver dollars, and they brought them to the subtreasury and there deposited them, and they said, "We are entitled to receive certificates." Does anybody suppose if they had shipped gold to that subtreasury there would have been any question? Not at all. So the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] did not go a step too far when he said that was a distinct violation of the plain provision of the statute. It is so plain, that every man who reads must recognize the fact that it is a willful, deliberate attempt on the part of the Treasurer of the United States to see that the people who brought in silver did not get certificates, if he could avoid it.

It is not the only instance that can be cited since this Secretary of the Treasury and this Treasurer have been dealing with public affairs to show that they do not intend to allow the people to handily and readily exchange their silver dollars for the representative of those dollars provided for in the act of 1878. It is apparent in everything this administration has done—and I do not desire to single out this administration as more particularly hostile to silver than some of the preceding administrations; but I am dealing now with the acts of this Treasurer and this Secretary of the Treasury; and I say everything that has been done by them has been done with an eye single to making it impossible, or difficult at least, for the people holding silver dollars to exchange them for silver certificates, and I will convict the administration of that from their own statements, from their own record.

I may say more than that; I will indorse what was said by the Senator from Louisiana, who said it appeared that they were making silver odious; and that is what the letter read here says seems to be the object, or at least that is the result of the action of the Treasury Department, to make silver objectionable, to make the people decline to take it, and the writer of the letter states that he has information that in some parts of the country the merchants decline to take it. Why? Because it is an eighty-cent dollar? Not at all, but because the Department charged with the administration of the statute of 1878 declines to execute it in spirit or in letter.

Who is the Secretary of the Treasury that he should attempt to depart from the deliberate judgment of the American Congress? Where does he get the training that enables him to say "I possess all the knowledge, all the learning, all the wisdom on the question of finance, and no matter what the legislative department of the Government may say, I know what is for the good of the country?" What has been his training? I understand that there are men on this floor who have given months and years of thought to this subject where he has ever given an hour. His training has not fitted him, and his appointment and confirmation by the Senate did not make him a man wise in financial affairs.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to say that when I got up a few moments ago to place on record certain papers which I had in my hand I was under the impression that the Senator from Louisiana had closed his remarks. I now ask, if the Senate will permit me, to place these papers on record, as they have direct connection with the question at issue.

Mr. TELLER. You desire to have them read?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Let them be read.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire also to state that I am personally acquainted with Mr. John Martin, the gentleman who writes the letter, who is the president of the Farmers and Merchants' Bank at the town where I live, and I vouch for him as an honorable gentleman.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PARIS, TEX., January 13, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Has your Department any regulation by which this bank can exchange, without cost or carriage, gold coin for United States currency, national-bank notes, or silver certificates? We have a considerable accumulation of gold coin, so large in fact that it threatens to be burdensome, especially as we find difficulty in getting it to circulate.

Our customers dislike to take it over the counter, preferring notes, and indicating no preference as between the issues mentioned above. An early reply will greatly oblige.

Yours, very truly,

JNO. MARTIN,
President Farmers and Merchants' Bank.

HON. C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States, Washington, D. C.

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
New York, January 19, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 13th instant, stating that you desire to exchange gold coin for United States or national-bank notes or silver certificates, if it can be done without expense to your bank, I beg to say that I am unable, under the regulations of the Department, to make such an exchange.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States.

JOHN MARTIN,
President Farmers and Merchants' Bank, Paris, Tex.

Mr. MAXEY. Before the Senator from Colorado proceeds I desire to state that to my personal knowledge that bank is a bona fide institution, doing a respectable business. The correspondence was received by me this morning. The bank is duly organized under the laws of Texas, and is a State bank.

Mr. TELLER. Why can they not issue silver certificates or silver for gold? Simply because the Treasury Department has revoked an order that was in existence for a long time under which $80,000,000 of gold went into the Treasury of the United States. Why they do not do it is another question. That is answered by the simple fact that the Treasury Department has undertaken to make silver odious in this country and compel the people to complain of the burden of carrying the silver dollars in their pockets. Its officials have attempted to frustrate and destroy the very provision of the law that was put in it to make it acceptable to the people, knowing very well, as the legislative body did, that the people in this country desire neither gold nor silver to be carried on their person, but simply the representative of gold and silver, and that alone. The President of the United States in his message uttered a truth that nobody can deny or dispute when he said:

It will not be disputed that any attempt on the part of the Government to cause the circulation of silver dollars worth 80 cents side by side with gold dollars worth 100 cents, even within the limit that legislation does not run counter to the laws of trade, to be successful must be seconded by the confidence of the people that both coins will retain the same purchasing power and be interchangeable at will.

Let me again read the concluding clause:

Must be seconded by the confidence of the people that both coins will retain the same purchasing power and be interchangeable at will.

In other words, the President of the United States enunciates the simple truth that if the people do not believe the silver dollar will perform the functions of a dollar they do not want it. Does anybody need an argument upon that self-evident proposition? Now, what has been the policy of the Government ever since the issue of the first silver dollar and the first silver certificate under the law of 1878 and what is it to-day? To depreciate and degrade the silver dollar and convince the people all over the United States that the silver dollar, if it to-day performs the functions of a dollar, will not perform those functions much longer, and yet they say it is wondered that the silver dollar does not circulate! They bar the mints to it, shut the Treasury against it, and in every possible way decline to allow gold to be exchanged for silver, and yet say that the silver will not circulate and the people do not want it.

I do not wish to use harsh terms, but it looks to me very much as if there was a determined, preconcerted effort being made to convince the people that he who puts in his pocket five dollars of silver may have next week but four dollars for them, and that, too, coming from the officials of the Government who are degrading the Government coin. Why, Mr. President, there is a law against the debasement of coin, and men have been hung who debased the coin, who put base metal with the good. Why? Because they were cheating the people; and yet the Government here is debasing its own money by its officials who are sworn to enforce the laws. Take the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. I said a word about the Secretary just now. I said that neither his training nor his past life entitled him to assume that he had all the wisdom of the country upon this question of finance; but I know that everywhere through the country among the people they believe, and they naturally believe, that the Government when it has called a man to the head of this Department of their Government, the greatest perhaps of all the Departments, must have called a trained man and a man who has made a life-long study of the questions he has to deal with and administer upon, and the people take the statement of this man as coming with authority, and they think with experience and with wisdom.

Now let us see what the Secretary of the Treasury says. The President says you must have the confidence of the people in silver money or else it can not be made equivalent to gold, or, as the Treasurer says, the equivalency can not be sustained. What does the Secretary say?

> Currency reform is first in the order of importance and of time, and fitly precedes other reforms, even taxation reform, because it will facilitate all other reforms, and because it can not safely be deferred.

Oh, Mr. President, the men who preceded this "Daniel come to judgment," the men who administered this Department in the trying hours of war, when there were great issues to be presented, were all ignoramuses compared to this man who asserts now that the question of finance has reached such a point that it is the all-absorbing question and everything else is dwarfed into insignificance. He ought to be a trained financial thinker to thus declare to the country and to the world. What else does he say?

> The coinage act of 1878 is overloading the mints with unissued, the subtreasuries with returned silver dollars, and will unavoidably convert the funds of the Treasury into those depreciated and depreciating coins.

Do you wonder that the merchants in Texas are getting alarmed at the silver dollar? Do you wonder that the man who works by the day, who is accumulating a little money and may want to lay it up for the time of need, dare not put it in a silver dollar and put it away as he otherwise would, when the Financial Department of the Government is declaring that it is both depreciated and depreciating money? I wonder how the President expected that confidence could be kept in the equivalency of the two dollars when his financial minister is thus discrediting and debasing the coin of the realm.

Then follow other charges against the silver dollar. I said in the outset and I said the other day on this floor that the Department was trying to discredit silver. I say that they have not only tried to discredit it, but they have tried to fill the vaults with it, so that they might go to the people and complain that the Government can not get out this money in the course of trade and commerce. On the 1st day of July, 1885, there had been issued in exchange either for gold or silver dollars $139,000,000 of silver certificates. On the 1st day of November, 1885, there were only $125,000,000 of those silver certificates in existence, of which the Treasury of the United States held $31,000,000 and upward. What had become of the others? They had been canceled and destroyed by the administration; they had been called in, and the Treasury declined to put out any more silver dollars.

We are told very gravely that if this thing continues we shall reach a silver basis. Who has a right to say whether we shall reach a silver basis or not, except the Congress of the United States? These men are to administer the law as it is given to them by Congress, and not as they think it ought to be wisely made. If we reach a silver basis, it is not for them to be concerned about it. It is for Congress to say. It is for them to enforce the law as it is given to them.

We hear now in these days the veriest declamation that the Government of the United States is compelled to coin money, compelled to coin silver dollars. Who compels the Government to coin them? There is a law which says the agents of the Government charged with its financial affairs shall coin, and they gravely assume that the Government is being compelled and coerced. In other words, the Secretary of the Treasury has become the Government of the United States. They tell us that in the face of the fact that last year for a whole year there was only about one-fourth of the entire sum of money paid in for duties paid in silver certificates, and of the silver dollars only one-tenth of 1 per cent. paid in, and that was more than went in of gold. Gold certificates went in to a large extent. Why? Because the people did not want to hold the gold certificates. It is not the circulating medium of the country, and they paid that in and they held the silver certificates; but the Department determined that they should have neither silver nor silver certificates, and so from $139,000,000 in July they reduced the silver certificates to $125,000,000 in October and to $124,000,000 to-day; and yet we are gravely told that this question is of so little importance that it ought not to be discussed in the American Senate—the question, first, whether the men who are intrusted with the financial management of this country shall be amenable to law or whether they shall set at defiance the will of the people as expressed through their representatives, the only way they have of expressing their will and their determination. It is not a question of construction; it is not a question that they have any right to higgle upon; it is their duty to obey the law as read to the Senate by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] a few minutes since. Last year of the customs dues 26 per cent. was paid in silver certificates. Let me turn to the figures; let me read them, so that the facts may go into the RECORD, so that some people who do not have an opportunity of hearing the truth always may hear it through the RECORD.

The following is a summary of the table—

Says the Treasurer in his report.

The following is a summary of the table:

Received in—	Per cent.
Gold coin	1.8
Gold certificates	51.0
Silver coin	0.1
Silver certificates	26.5
United States notes	20.6
Total	100.0

I recollect a few days since the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] entertained the Senate upon this question, and predicted that if we did not change our method, if we did not yield to the demand of the banks and the bankers and demonetize silver, or, what is the same thing, repeal the coinage act, we should receive for public dues all silver and no gold; and yet here is the summary for a year showing that there was only 26 per cent. and a fraction of the whole sum paid in for duties that was paid in the despised silver certificate.

It is said there is danger that we shall reach a silver basis, and for that reason the President of the United States declared to us that the Treasury Department was buying every month two million dollars' worth of silver with gold or its equivalent and not with silver certificates or silver; and the reason given by the Department is that if they should pay out silver certificates or silver dollars they would find their way into the Treasury; and so they take $2,000,000 of gold out every month and pay that out rather than pay out the silver certificates, for fear the silver certificate would return. Would they be any worse off if that took place than they are now? They do not pay gold for silver for the reason that they are afraid the silver will return. It is because it is a part and parcel of the conspiracy to degrade and debase silver and make it appear all over the country that the people will not take it as money and that it will not much longer perform the functions of a dollar.

Mr. President, when public officials study public questions I yield always much deference to their opinions; but their opinions are only worthy of consideration when they come here and show, first, that they are intelligent, and, second, that they are honestly intending to carry out the provisions of the law. When it appears, as it does appear by the study of these reports, that the Department means to discredit silver in every possible way and render it impossible for the people to use the representative of the silver dollar, forcing upon them the dollar which they may think is objectionable, then their opinions have little and deserve but little weight at the hands of any man. The amount of silver certificates has decreased month by month since the present administration came into power. It is a part and parcel, I say, of the scheme; so they continue month after month, and then they declare that silver will not circulate and that the people will not take it, when they lock it up in their vaults and decline to let it go out.

The President of the United States went into an extended argument. With all deference to the President of the United States I will say of him, as I said of his financial minister, that his business is to execute the law, to make proper recommendations to Congress, and then he is absolved from further questions of this character. It is neither fitting nor proper that one great department of the Government, wielding the immense power that it does, should be used for the purpose of furthering the views either of the Executive or the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasurer or any other public officer. I repeat again, the question of what shall be the policy of the United States, for two money metals or one, is a question that the people of the United States have intrusted to their representatives, and not either to the Executive or to subordinate officers; and the people will hold their representatives, and them only, responsible if they make a mistake, provided the executive department will keep its hands off and confine itself to its legitimate business under the Constitution and under the laws.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into any lengthy discussion of the silver question, but in view of this extraordinary attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury and Treasurer of the United States, it seems to me proper to call attention to the real facts in this case. Denunciation of these two officers would lead the country to believe that they had violated the law. It has been so stated by the Senator from Louisiana, who introduced this resolution, as well as by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator permit me to correct the statement? I made no denunciation whatsoever of the Secretary of the Treasury. I challenge the gentleman to point to a single remark which I made in any way in the spirit of criticism of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Treasurer was the only official whose action I criticised.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no desire to attribute to the Senator from Louisiana any statement which he did not make. Possibly he has confined it to the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. EUSTIS. Quite probably and truly.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Louisiana, then, confines his remarks to the Treasurer of the United States, and yet he knows, and the country knows, that the Treasurer of the United States would not have ventured to take action on an important question like this, being a subordinate officer, without the sanction and by the direction of his superior. The Senator from Colorado comes squarely up to the question, and he denounces the Secretary of the Treasury. If there is anything wrong in this transaction, he is the responsible officer, and the Senator from Colorado was quite right in naming the proper officer of this Government. He denounced him as one who has not been trained in financial matters, one who has not been accustomed to conduct the affairs of this great Department.

Now, sir, look at the facts in this case and judge him by his acts and the circumstances surrounding the case. When this administration came into the possession of the Government in March last they found the subtreasury at New Orleans in the possession of a man for whom you, sir [addressing Mr. TELLER], more than any other on this floor—for you were a member of the administration that appointed him—were responsible for his being in that position. He was a Republican and not in sympathy with this administration; and the present Secretary of the Treasury and the present Treasurer of the United States, who are denounced on this floor by the Senator from Colorado as unworthy of the positions they hold—the officers, on examining the accounts at the subtreasury at New Orleans, ascertained that the office was not conducted properly or efficiently. On their own motion a commission was sent to Louisiana to ascertain what the trouble was at the subtreasury in New Orleans. They found that the cashier was in bad health, that there were not sufficient clerks in that office to receive and handle the moneys that were paid for customs and offered for redemption and exchange. That was the condition of the subtreasury when they looked into it in May last. When that fact was ascertained, the Treasury Department, to relieve the subtreasury at New Orleans, directed them to send all the mutilated notes, all bank notes, in the original packages, here to Washington, so that the force at New Orleans which was provided for by law might handle the gold and the silver that was presented. Notwithstanding that relief, which was the only relief that could be given by the Secretary of the Treasury, still the force was found not sufficient to receive and count all the silver that was tendered to that subtreasury. Silver had so accumulated that it was impossible for the existing force to handle it.

The Senator from Louisiana had previously introduced a resolution into this body to ascertain what the real facts were in this case, and hence it does seem to me that it is extraordinary after the statements which have been furnished by the Treasurer of the United States that the resolution of to-day should be introduced.

The Treasurer of the United States in his communication of February 1, 1886, in answer to the resolution of the Senator, states frankly that he never issued an order to the subtreasurer at New Orleans to decline to receive silver and issue silver certificates therefor, and when the subtreasurer at New Orleans informed him that certain banks in Tennessee and Texas were trying to use that depository as a convenience for transfer between the banks, bringing the silver from various points in the Mississippi Valley to the subtreasury at New Orleans merely to transfer it thence to another bank at New Orleans, that he had not the force to accommodate the banks, and he declined to do it, the Treasurer of the United States said to him, "You are quite right; the subtreasury is not a convenience for national banks, and you will decline to receive any silver that is presented to you except the silver that you can count and issue certificates for on the day it is presented."

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator tell me whether he has read the letter of January 2, of Mr. T. R. Roach, cashier of the State National Bank, and the reply of the assistant treasurer of the United States, Mr. J. W. Whelpley, on the 7th of January? Does not that correspondence bear out the assertion that it was not for another bank, but for the State National Bank at New Orleans? They proposed there to have this money paid to their credit; they were the agents of the shippers; and to that the Treasurer of the United States replied:

> I beg to inform you that the action of the assistant treasurer, declining to receive such deposits, is approved by this office.

Mr. GORMAN. That statement, precisely as the Senator from Colorado has read it, does not convey the whole facts in this case. The subtreasurer at New Orleans had informed the Treasurer of the United States that this transaction alluded to in that correspondence was a convenience between certain national banks, and if the Senator will look at the letter on the next page he will find that when the president of the bank in New Orleans communicated with the Treasurer here in Washington, the Treasurer, on the 14th day of January, 1886, which was the last communication on this subject, said to him:

> Referring to your inquiry of the 11th instant, I beg to say that in exchange for standard silver dollars deposited by your bank with the assistant treasurer in your city silver certificates will be furnished you, after count and certification by that officer.

This is the last communication on the subject, and it is the only application in this entire correspondence that was made for certificates; but the effort was to use the Government as an intermediary between three or four national banks so that the expressage and all the charges incident to the transfer might be charged to the Government. This seems to be the silver idea run mad.

Mr. President, I am not opposed to silver; but I say to my friend who represents a great silver-producing State that the certain way to destroy that interest is to be constantly attacking gentlemen in high position who desire to be fair not only to the silver but to the gold interest, to be constantly bringing the matter up, trying to force the Government to discriminate in favor of one kind of money. I am not opposed to silver; I believe in silver, and I believe in an honest silver dollar.

Why attack the Treasury officers for doing what you, sir, as a high officer in this Government, sitting around the council board, knowing, as you must have known, the laws of the land, allowed to be done by the party to which you belong? You knew that your party and the party to which I belong in Congress had not furnished sufficient clerical force at New Orleans to handle silver in large quantities. Then why hold the new administration which has just come into power responsible for the deficiency that existed when they assumed control?

The Secretary of the Treasury may not have the knowledge of the Senator from Colorado; for, Mr. President, the Democratic party has been out of power for twenty-four years. We have but few men in that party who have been trained in the Departments of the Government. That is a misfortune to the party, but I have no doubt it is good for the country that once at least in twenty-four years we may have some men brought to these great Departments without training in official position, fresh from the people, earnest in their advocacy of the best interests of the country as they understand them, who will go on, regardless of these attacks coming from both sides of the Chamber, and I am sorry to say the greater number of them coming from the side upon which I stand. Time will show that at least the Secretary of the Treasury is an honest man, who intends to look at the welfare of his country, a gentleman who came here with no desire for place. I think he is the peer of my friend from Colorado or any other gentleman on this floor.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me, not to interfere in this discussion, but to ascertain the drift of this long debate? Under a Republican administration it was generally charged that they were unwilling to put the silver dollar in circulation; now I understand it to be the charge against a Democratic administration that they are not willing to take the silver dollar back again. Is that the drift of the discussion? So far as I understand it appears to be that the Democratic administration are not willing to take the silver dollar back.

Mr. GORMAN. In answer to the Senator from Vermont I will say that the view which he suggests is not confined to either side of the Chamber. It does seem that on this great question the Senator from Vermont himself as well as many of the most eminent Democrats that we have agree, and he will find his party as well as ours on this side of the Chamber very thoroughly divided upon the question. It is not a party question. I am not addressing myself to general party questions, but to the attack, and I think the uncalled-for attack, upon two high officers of this Government who have done nothing except to comply with the law as far as it was in their power to do so.

Why, sir, at New Orleans, for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of business, to enable silver to have a fair field, the present Secretary of the Treasury found that the previous administration had permitted the silver to pile up in the vaults until there was not room to store it, and he sent two war vessels to bring ten or twelve million dollars from that point to Washington, that there might be room for silver coming from Colorado, where the people have no use for the silver dollar. And yet the Secretary is denounced because he has not furnished clerical force enough at New Orleans, not provided for by law, to accommodate the exchanges between national banks!

That is all there is in this case. I have no objection to any resolution of inquiry, nor has the Secretary of the Treasury, but I would not have said a word in regard to the resolution but for that which has fallen from the lips of my friend from Louisiana and the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I do not intend, having assumed the responsibility of introducing this resolution, that the important point involved in it shall be dissipated by any effort at declamation. I desire to inform the Senator from Maryland that I have exercised extreme caution with reference to this matter, but at the same time I have also exercised the faculties of my judgment under a due sense of responsibility in the discharge of my public duty; and when I corrected his misstatement, which was inadvertently made, that I had indulged in any denunciation of the Secretary of the Treasury, it was not because I wished that he should for a moment infer that if, as a United States Senator, after deliberate reflection, I reached the conclusion that the Secretary of the Treasury had justly incurred my criticism, I would for an instant have hesitated to withhold it from any consideration whatsoever. It was only because the Secretary of the Treasury had referred my former resolution to the Treasurer of the United States without making any report upon it coming from him, but simply sending to the Senate in answer to that resolution the report of the Treasurer himself and the correspondence which he (the Treasurer) had had with the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, that I felt it proper, if I had the right to initiate or to provoke any investigation whatsoever, to select that officer to ascertain whether he had conscientiously and honestly discharged his duty. I have myself made no accusation whatsoever; I have simply acted upon a state of facts represented to me by a responsible and by a credible person who has had dealings with the assistant treasurer in the city of New Orleans and has had correspondence with the Treasurer of the United States, and after those dealings and after that correspondence deliberately addressed to me as a United States Senator making the statement that practically (to use his own language) the receipt of silver dollars for which silver certificates were asked to be exchanged was denied.

Mr. President, I do not wish any wrong impression to go out with reference to this shipment of $25,000, to which particularly I addressed my resolution for the purpose of investigation. The Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Maryland want to create the impression that these banks merely asked as a favor of the subtreasury to receive this deposit as so much surplus silver for which they had no use, and they say they wanted to deposit it in the vaults of the subtreasury. Such is not the fact. I do not wish to attribute any intention or purpose to this representation on the part of any Senator; but inasmuch as my resolution is predicated upon a certain state of facts, I am responsible to see that that state of facts is accurately stated, and I deny that such was the purpose of that shipment; and in order to place this question beyond the possibility of dispute or controversy, I will call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the reply of the Treasurer of the United States, dated Washington, January 7, 1886, with reference to this identical shipment of silver. He says:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, January 7, 1886.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 2d instant, concerning shipments by certain banks of standard silver dollars to your office, for returns (after count) in silver certificates to their New Orleans correspondent, I beg to state that your action declining to receive such shipments is approved. No reason appears why the Treasury should receive deposits other than on account of the Government.

Very respectfully,

J. W. WHELPLEY,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

HON. SAMUEL FLOWER,
Assistant Treasurer of the United States,
New Orleans, La.

How can any statement be more explicit? There is the statement of the assistant treasurer himself that this deposit was made in order to be returned in silver certificates, and his refusal to receive such proffer was approved by the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, I ask the Senator from Louisiana to read the letter of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to which that was a reply, and say to the Senate frankly whether the assistant treasurer at New Orleans did not advise the Department that the transaction was a mere accommodation for the convenience of the banks?

Mr. EUSTIS. That is not the language of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans. He says this was to be received—

On account of the State National Bank of this city.

According to my understanding of the duties and functions of this office, I have assumed that, without authorizing instructions from the Department office, it is not a depository or intermediary in the matter of shipments from one bank to another—a transaction which might involve new responsibilities and accounts.

And in the previous paragraph, speaking of shipments from one bank to another, he says this identical amount was shipped directly to the subtreasury and not through any bank.

Within the past two days I have received from the First National Bank of Memphis, Tenn., the Bank of Commerce, same place, and the Waco State Bank, of Waco, Tex., respectively, letters advising that they had shipped by express to this office—

Not to any other bank—to this office silver dollars amounting in the aggregate to $25,000, to be received on account of the State National Bank of this city.

To be sent directly to the subtreasury, and the shippers notify the subtreasury to give their receipts or silver certificates to their correspondents or agents in New Orleans.

The Senator from Massachusetts tried to compliment me on the fact that I drew a distinction between what was the law and what was the custom. Let me say that so far as this investigation is concerned that is not a pertinent inquiry for the reason that I will frankly state, and I will always speak frankly with reference to such matters, I do not care whether the officials implicated, if they be implicated, are Democrats or Republicans. What I desire to have discovered is the motive, why this thing was done, not merely whether it is against the law or not.

Now I will ask the Senator from Maryland whether he will vote against a resolution which merely proposes an inquiry into the official conduct of an officer of the Government?

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I stated distinctly that I would never vote against a resolution of inquiry directed to any officer of the Government; nor would I have said one word upon this resolution were it not for what I considered ill-timed and unpleasant insinuations made about high public officers of the Government whom I consider as pure and honorable men as any Senators on this floor.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will ask the Senator whether he heard the resolution which I offered read?

Mr. GORMAN. I did.

Mr. EUSTIS. The first part of the investigation is simply this, whether the custom mentioned has prevailed at the city of New Orleans, as I have not the slightest doubt that it has, because I am so informed by the letter of the gentleman which I have read, and why that custom has been changed, and if it has been changed whether that custom is still in force at the subtreasury in New York. What possible objection can any Senator have to have that matter inquired into? The next inquiry is whether or not there has been and there is now an adequate clerical force at the subtreasury in New Orleans to discharge the duties of that office? What objection can there be to that inquiry?

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to ask him a question? I take it that in draughting these resolutions he remembered the law. Now, let me say to the Senator that the entire appropriation for the clerical force at the subtreasury office in New Orleans is only $32,000 per annum, and the slightest inquiry on the part of the Senator, either by consulting the laws of Congress or by investigation at the Department, would have convinced him that with the immense amount of silver passing through that office it was physically impossible to conduct this business with the force allowed.

Mr. EUSTIS. Then I ask the Senator from Maryland whether he does not consider that it was the duty of the Treasurer of the United States, knowing such a condition of things to exist, to report to the Secretary of the Treasury, in order that he might apply to Congress to supply a remedy for this great evil and this great wrong? I should like an answer to that question.

But in order to show that I have made no statement whether or not there was sufficient clerical force, because I do not know, I will call the Senator's attention to a statement made in the letter addressed by Mr. T. R. Roach, cashier, to the Treasurer, dated January 2. After speaking of the first reason why the receipt of these silver dollars was refused, he goes on and says:

There may be more force in the second objection, viz, the lack of clerks to attend to this class of business; but if he has the same force that his predecessor had last winter (when the conversion of standard dollars into silver certificates was done quite largely) he should be able to accommodate the public equally as well as was done by Assistant Treasurer Herwig.

This is a letter from a gentleman who has had constant dealings with the subtreasury, not only this year, but he says he had them last year, and he finds that under Mr. Herwig's administration, which administration I wish to be understood that I am not at all defending—far from it—this impediment and obstruction which is now complained of and which now exists did not exist, and Mr. Herwig had sufficient clerical force to meet the demands, however large they were, in order to give silver certificates for silver dollars.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to ask if any obstruction has ever been known before?

Mr. EUSTIS. I have never heard of any.

I wish to say, Mr. President, and I say it in all candor, that I know the assistant treasurer at New Orleans very well, and I can testify to his high character. I know him to be a gentleman of intelligence. I do not know whether he is a gold man or a silver man. He may have become afflicted one way or the other in connection with fiscal life, but I do not know how that is. I wish to say, however, that he is a man of very high character; and I have not attempted at all in any way to reflect upon Mr. Flower, the assistant treasurer at this time. Inasmuch as whatever he has done has been approved by his superior officer, whether it is right or wrong, I hope I shall not incur the displeasure or the violent criticism of the Senator from Maryland if I find that that superior officer is the officer responsible, if there be any responsibility attached to such an act.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I suppose there can be no objection to the passage of this resolution nor to the inquiry proposed, and therefore I see no occasion for debate about it. It seems to me that it is perfectly clear that the resolution ought to pass.

But I wish to say another thing in connection with it, that the law is mandatory upon an assistant treasurer to receive silver dollars. He has no right to inquire for whose account they are presented, for whose benefit they are handed in. It is his duty without question to receive them, to count them, and to issue silver certificates of proper denominations. That can not take much time. Twenty-five thousand dollars is a large sum, but very easily disposed of. In counting the silver dollars they could be either weighed or counted. It would take a short time to count that sum. Nor would it be a difficult transaction for a United States assistant treasurer to pay over $25,000 in silver certificates in the larger denominations mostly, already prepared; and that is the plain and mandatory provision of the law. Indeed, the principal object of that law was to secure an equivalency and a ready convertibility of silver certificates and silver dollars at all times at the subtreasuries, there being no other public officers who would have money to redeem them or who are charged with the custody of these securities except the Treasurer and the assistant treasurers. They are the only persons who could be armed by the law with this power, and I never knew of any case, so far as my experience went, where, when silver dollars were presented, they were not readily redeemed by silver certificates. That is the way provided by the law, and therefore I do not see myself the difficulty in the way of carrying into execution this law.

If the bank mentioned in the letter read to-day would propose to the assistant treasurer to deposit silver dollars on account, and ask the assistant treasurer to open an account with the bank for silver dollars deposited he would very properly refuse. If that was the transaction, he has no authority by any law to open an account with any individual. All he can do is to pay out silver certificates for silver dollars. But it seems to me in the practical workings of that duty there is no difficulty and that no great clerical force ought to be required for it. One man in the discharge of that duty might probably redeem all that would be presented in any day in the city of New Orleans.

I do not want to criticise public officers, certainly I do not do it because they are Democrats, for I think they ought to be treated fairly and justly and impartially. The only criticism I have made not only of the Secretary of the Treasury but of the Treasurer of the United States is, that they did not continue the practice that had existed ever since 1880, soon after the silver dollar was issued in large quantities and ever since the silver certificates could issue in large sums, to issue the silver certificates for the purchase of gold bullion. That practice was established soon after the passage of the silver-certificate and silver-dollar law, and thus silver certificates were put largely into circulation in exchange for gold bullion. That was an enormous benefit to commercial transactions. At certain seasons of the year great masses of gold coin, gold bullion, and gold coins of foreign countries, which are redeemable at the mints at certain mint prices as they are called, are brought here to buy corn and cotton or rather wheat and cotton. Some of this was deposited in New Orleans, but mainly in New York, scarcely any of it in New Orleans. Experience shows that the Treasury could very easily use silver certificates in the purchase of gold bullion. The power to purchase gold bullion is unlimited. The power to purchase silver bullion is limited to $4,000,000 a month and not less than $2,000,000 a month. Then it must be purchased in open market; but the power to purchase gold bullion at the mint price is unlimited; and I do not see why this administration in the discharge of its duties in the Treasury Department should not use silver certificates in the purchase of gold bullion.

While I had the honor to be Secretary of the Treasury I adopted that expedient and my successor followed it. We purchased a large portion of the gold bullion needed for coinage and for reserves with silver certificates. More than eighty million dollars' worth was purchased in that way. Gold bullion is brought in here in a form in which it can not usually circulate to buy the products required in foreign markets, and it was a great object to commercial men to facilitate the use of that gold, and in order to do it silver certificates were given to them. They could use the silver certificates in payment, and the result was a large mass of silver certificates were paid out for gold bullion, and were again paid out all over the country, and especially in the West and South for cotton and for wheat. That was a convenience for commerce, and plainly a legal proposition, and in that way the gold reserves were fortified and increased from an unexpected source by the use of paper money provided for by law. It seems to me that the criticism which can fairly be made upon the conduct of the present administration is that they discontinued that simple and beneficial operation of finance.

Mr. EUSTIS. When was it discontinued?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know the date, but I think some time during the last winter or spring.

Mr. TELLER. I will answer that, if the Senator will allow me. I read from the last report of the Treasurer of the United States:

> The issue of silver certificates by Treasury offices in the South and West, for gold coin deposited with the assistant treasurer at New York, under departmental circular of September 18, 1880, was discontinued in January last. The amount which had been issued in this manner to the date named was $30,720,580.

Mr. COCKRELL. During the preceding administration.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was discontinued probably by Mr. McCulloch.

Mr. TELLER. Probably it was.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should think so from that statement; I thought it was discontinued later. But it makes no difference. It seems to me that was a proper mode of fortifying the gold reserve, and it ought to have been continued; and I trust that the present officers will see, as they were not responsible for its discontinuance, that being the proper way it is the best way in which they can fortify their gold reserve and at the same time use the silver certificates. There is no doubt about the legality of that transaction.

In respect to this deposit in controversy, I can see myself that at certain seasons of the year silver dollars accumulate, especially in the winter. They are largely paid out in the summer and fall, mainly for agricultural labor, and they are usually paid out very fully and freely, especially in the South. Then when the winter comes these silver dollars must be spent for the necessaries of life. In this way they naturally accumulate in banks scattered all over the South and West, and I can see that it would make a drug even of gold coin if gold was paid out in place of silver dollars. It is not a form in which the people care to hoard money, and therefore naturally these silver dollars would accumulate in Texas, in Mississippi, and in all the cotton-growing region, and especially in the Western country, and it has always flowed to the commercial centers in exchange for silver certificates, which can be kept more readily by banks. Banks have not usually the means of hoarding silver dollars. In modern times large safes and large vaults are not kept even by the largest banks, and therefore it is very inconvenient for banks, however large they may be, to hoard even $25,000 in silver, because it takes a great deal of room and is very bulky.

Therefore it was that the law expressly provided that the silver dollars may flow back into the Treasury, where are, or at least are supposed to be, large vaults and safes, where large sums of money can be kept. They would flow there naturally and be received and the silver certificates would issue. The silver certificates would be kept for the purchase probably of wheat and other produce by wholesale, but the labor which produces the wheat and the cotton must be paid for in silver dollars. The result was that the larger transactions of buying by the merchant the crops of the West was done by silver certificates in large denominations, while the work, the labor which yielded the cotton and the wheat, was paid for by silver dollars.

It was manifestly proper, and the Treasury Department ought to open their gates and their doors freely to make this exchange whenever it is demanded by anybody. The banks are mere agents of a great number of people. They usually have but little interest in this silver money; they are simply, like the Treasury itself, agents of commerce. They receive from their customers at New Orleans and at other places these large masses of silver, but they have no means of keeping it. If they were compelled to hoard these silver dollars, as a matter of course it would bring discredit upon silver altogether, because they would be inconvenient to handle, while if received promptly in the Treasury and silver certificates given instead, they can in a single package, in a single division of a safe, put $25,000 of silver certificates without inconvenience. That very fact was provided for by the law. It seems to me it is simple, and in ordinary practice it ought not to create any difficulty.

As to whether there is sufficient force in the subtreasury at New Orleans to count the money I do not know, but it seems to me that is easily provided for. The duties have existed since 1880, because this operation by which large masses of silver dollars have been paid out occurred immediately after the coinage of the silver dollar to my certain knowledge, so that this course of business must have been going on since 1880.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator if he knows what is the practice of the subtreasuries with reference to counting the silver? Are not the dollars all counted by weight, as a rule?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know, but it is not very difficult to count dollars even by the piece; it is done with great rapidity.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not sure, but I think it is the custom to count by weight on the scale.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is the custom to count them by weight, because it is known that a thousand dollars weigh so much, and therefore it is not a difficult transaction.

It seems to me that the cost of a clerk or two ought not to have prevented this duty from going on, because it would be easy for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer a clerk or two and use the contingent fund for that purpose. I do not think there would be any difficulty in getting clerical force enough in New Orleans to perform this duty, nor do I see any reason why the bank desiring to deposit this silver should demand what is called a credit or wish to deposit it and have it held on call. That is something which as a matter of course the Treasury ought to deny, but the ordinary payment on deposit of silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States in exchange for silver certificates is the right of the individual holder. It is not the right of the Government officers to refuse. It is the right of each individual holder of $10, so that any groceryman might go to the subtreasurer with $10 in silver and he could there deposit it as a matter of right and receive his silver certificate. I can see no reason in any facts stated here why that has not been done. Perhaps there may be, but if the resolution passes and goes to the Committee on Finance, as a matter of course the first thing my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will do will be to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for an explanation, and he will have, no doubt, an opportunity to make an explanation, and I trust it will be satisfactory.

Mr. MORRILL. Can we call for the reasons?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that we can call on any Department for the reasons of any official act. The only thing I believe that is denied under the resolution of my friend from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], which I believe is now the orthodox doctrine of the Democratic party, is that we shall not call upon the President for reasons why he removed somebody as an offensive partisan. I think that is about the extent of the claim now. I do not believe that the Senator from Alabama or any Senator denies the right of the Senate as a legislative body to call for the reasons of any act of a Department. I know when that controversy arose in the Hayes administration, President Hayes did exactly what Mr. Cleveland did; he said that as a co-ordinate branch of the Government he was not bound to give his reasons for an official act. I think that is right; but that we have a right to call for information of any kind whatever in any Department of the Government, whether it be by written order or by parol, I do not think there is the slightest doubt. Indeed, but for that we could not legislate; but for that we could not act wisely in executive session.

I do not believe in the doctrine at all. I have just as much right to go to any Department of this Government and ask for any paper there in the possession of that Department that affects either legislative business or any question before us, if I go there armed with the power of the Senate, that the Secretary of the Treasury or the head of any Department of the Government or the President of the United States has. That has always been, from the formation of the Government, the established law. General Washington, in one of the first communications that he made upon this subject, complained of the Senate that they did not call for his reasons for making an appointment. In all my experience I have never known in my life a case where a Department or the President refused to give information contained on the files of any of the Departments upon any act whatever, whether executive or legislative.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, General Washington, I believe, did complain that the Senate did not ask his reasons for an appointment he proposed to make. He did not complain that they did not ask his reasons for a removal which he had made. He never made such a complaint as that.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. They did not make removals in those days.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a modern distinction that I think Senators will find no color for. If they can show where that nice distinction which is contained in the resolution of the Senator from Alabama first appeared, was first invented by mortal man, I should like to know the origin. What distinction is there? I can not see any. Any information that may affect the judgment or the conduct of a Senator, or any question of public duty he is called upon to perform, is information which he is bound to communicate. There ought to be no secrets whatever in this Government of ours, a government of the people. There is no law or provision or rule or regulation which provides for keeping secrets, except only——

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, the very act of 1869, the modified act for the benefit of General Grant, vested in the President a discretion in reference to the suspension of officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator from Ohio insist that we have anything to do with the exercise of the discretion of the President in the suspension or removal of an officer?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say this, that we have no right to say to the President, the head of another department of the Government, "For what reason did you do this thing?" The President has no right to come to us and say, "Why did you pass this law?" He has no right to cross-examine us. The departments are separate and distinct from each other; but all the information contained on the files of any of those Departments is just as much the property of the Senator from Delaware as it is the property of any officer of the Government, and there is no secret of this Government that can be protected from legislative supervision.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg leave to differ with the Senator from Ohio to this extent. I believe it is our right, whenever we have a nomination to act upon, to call for any information in reference to the nominee, as to his business or his qualifications. When we go beyond that and inquire with reference to anything in connection with the suspended officer, that is a matter with which we have nothing to do, because under your very law the entire discretion is vested in the President. I should like to ask the Senator as a lawyer whether there is any court in this country that can control the discretion of a trustee, however humble his capacity as trustee may be? Is there any court, from the Supreme Court of the United States down, that can in any way influence or affect the exercise of discretion upon a common trustee or a commissioner or anybody else? Yet you are proceeding upon the assumption that you may control and supervise the discretion which your law of 1869 vested in the President of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAM. I should like to answer the Senator from Delaware and then I will give way with pleasure to the Senator from Alabama. Has anybody in the Senate Chamber proposed to control the exercise of discretion by the President?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then why do you want the information?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer now. Is not that an evasion of the whole controversy? We do not claim to exercise any power whatever over the discretion of the President. We admit even that we do not ask for his reasons. But we have the power to control our own discretion, and we have a right to all the information that can be given us from the Executive Departments to enlighten us upon any question, executive or legislative.

I did not want to precipitate this discussion about the questions that have grown up between the President and the Senate, but I should like to know where the Senator from Alabama got in the history of the past, in any precedent of the past, this distinction between executive information and legislative information. There is no such distinction.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Excuse me for a moment. The Senator from Delaware asked me why should we try to control the exercise of the discretion of the President. Nobody proposes to do it. He is as independent as we are, but he must not control our discretion. He must not prevent us from having the same sources of information that he has. The information comes to him first because he performs the first act in an appointment; that is, he makes the nomination. Why did he make that nomination? Was the former incumbent an unfit man, was he a corrupt man, a thief, a defaulter, or the like? Our discretion must be enlightened by the information that he has; and I say therefore that we have the right to call for that information.

At the same time we should be to the President always courteous, and if he should give any reason for withholding a paper because it was marked confidential, I would not object to that at all. If among the papers on the files there are papers never intended for the public and he chooses to withhold them on the ground that they were received by him in confidence, then, as a matter of course, that would probably be the exercise of a discretion which gentlemen in their intercourse with each other would recognize by saying, "That is a matter I do not care to talk about; that came to you in confidence; I can not say anything about it."

That is one thing, but when he says the papers upon which he acts contain charges, made boldly and openly there, which control his conduct in making an appointment, papers on the public files, he has no right to withhold those papers merely because they came to him in regard to an executive matter. He may give them to us. He ought to give them to us, unless they are in the nature of secret confidential communications made to him personally and they are marked secret. Then they ought not to be filed, they ought not to be there to poison the fame of a man in a future time or the fame of his family. If they are not to be seen by us they ought not to be seen or acted on by him. But the better way would be for him to put them in the waste-basket without reading them, as I always do with an anonymous communication that comes to me. Now I will yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. The question of the right of the Senate to call on the President for any information in his possession relating to the exercise of his power of removal is wholly irrelevant to the question now before the Senate on the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, and I object to dragging before the Senate and the country a discussion of the right of the Senate to make such a call upon the President or any member of his Cabinet for information within his own knowledge or contained in any of the papers in his possession relating to the exercise of a power that belongs exclusively to him under the Constitution, and not to the Senate.

The right of the Senate to call upon the President or any member of his Cabinet for information to enable them to prosecute an inquiry or to exercise a power that they do not possess under the Constitution is one thing. The right of the Senate, as part of the law-making power of the country, to ask for information of the President or of any member of his Cabinet is conferred expressly by section 248 of the Revised Statutes. In that section the right is given to either House to call on the Secretary of the Treasury for any documents or public records in his possession relating to matters in his Department of public concern or relating to the discharge of his official duty. That statute draws clearly the distinction upon which I rely in the resolution that I presented to the Senate between a call by the Senate upon the President or any member of his Cabinet for information in the possession of either or public records or public documents in the possession of either. The right of the Senate to make this call for the purpose of informing them, so that they can wisely and properly exercise their legislative powers, is conferred expressly by section 248, and that statute upon its face shows that the power conferred there upon either House was a power to be exercised by either House for the purpose of enabling it to discharge its duties in reference to legislation.

But you can not construe that statute, or any other, or any public law, or the Constitution, so as to confer the right upon the Senate to call for information from the President concerning matters belonging exclusively to him as the chief executive officer of the country. Such a right can not be found in any statute, or in any public law, or the Constitution of the country, and that statute, section 248, clearly shows that the power conferred there is a power conferred upon either House, and is to be exercised for the purpose I have stated, to enable either House to discharge its duties in the preparation of public laws relating to the duties of any public officer or to legislate to promote the public service of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has only stated——

Mr. PUGH. Allow me to add that the call you make upon the President or the call that you make upon any officer of the Cabinet is for public documents. You do not claim that the Senate can call upon him for any other than public documents or public papers. The character of those documents and records determines the right of the Senate to their possession. The character of those public documents decides whether the Senate has the right to call for them. The use that the Senate intend to make of them determines their right to make the call. Who is to be the judge of the character of those documents, whether they are public or private? Who is to be the judge of whether those documents, or records, or the information in the possession of the President or any member of his Cabinet is such as the Senate has the right to call for? Some one must have the power to determine that question, and there can not be any impropriety in conferring the right upon the President or any member of the Cabinet to determine whether the documents and the records are of the character that gives the Senate the right to make the call for them to use them in the exercise of their legislative power.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, retaining the floor, I have been certainly very indulgent to my friend from Alabama, whose opinion I always respect, in stating his position, but he has not stated anything but what was contained, probably in a more terse and vigorous way, in the resolution which my friend from Massachusetts has called a speech in the belly of a resolution.

Now, where did he discover this new-fangled idea? Where are the precedents which enabled him to say that the head of a Department can say what papers shall be given to Congress and what shall not? That he may say what are public records and what are private records on the files of the Treasury Department is in the face of the precedents. Where, in the experience of nearly a hundred years of American history, was this doctrine proclaimed before? When was it admitted? Never, until the present administration. The Senator and I were members of the other House many years ago, and he will remember that we then investigated time and time again the administrations of Franklin Pierce and of James Buchanan. We called before us all the pigeon-hole information, secret and public, in regard to those administrations, and it was never denied to us by the two last Democratic Presidents; they never pretended that they could withhold one paper and give another. On the contrary, in obedience to law, the Secretary of the Navy sent to a committee of the House of Representatives a private letter of James Buchanan, which entered into the public records, and was commented upon and used in cross-examination.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me have my say, if my friend will allow me. There was no doubt about that. The idea of a distinction between papers public and private in the public records never occurred until during the present administration and to meet an exigency.

The law is plain and mandatory. I happened to hold the office of Secretary of the Treasury for a time, and I was brought before both Houses of Congress; the Senate and the House not only called upon me for papers in a certain controverted case (that I shall not refer to at any length, because it related to executive session), but called on me to come in person and explain reasons and give reasons why and wherefore. I never conceived then that as an executive officer I had a right to put myself back on my dignity and say "I shall not obey." I never dared do such a thing. They said I was bold sometimes, but I was never so bold as that. No; the right of Congress, or either House of Congress, or a committee of Congress, or any member of Congress to examine the public records has always been conceded by the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Excuse me just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to ask just a single question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well.

Mr. PUGH. Do you believe the Senate has the right to call on the President to furnish the Senate with facts or information upon which he acted in making removals or suspensions?

Mr. SHERMAN. If that information is on the files of any Departments of the Government it is his duty to furnish it to us.

Mr. PUGH. Again, if the Senator will allow me, have you the right to make this call upon the President for such information to enable the Senate to review his action in making a removal?

Mr. SHERMAN. What right has he to say what purpose we want to use it for? If we have the right to these papers we have the right to use them for all they are worth. Shall the President come here and say, "You may look over these papers for one purpose and not for another?" Are these to be the relations between the law-making and the executive power of the Government? No, sir; there is no such distinction. If the papers are on the public files we have a right to see them. They may be immaterial; they may be useless. I have myself brought down to the Senate Chamber great piles of papers and handed them over to the different committees, and as a member of those committees I have called a hundred times for papers from the public files in the different Departments of the Government, and they were handed over to me and received by me as a public trustee as much bound to take care of them and to treat them fairly as the head of any Department of the Government.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator answer me whether he as Senator claims for the Senate a right to review the action of the President in making removals?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not necessary to go into that, but now I say so without question because that is the law, and I believe the law was constitutional when it was passed.

Now let us go a little further. Take the law here in regard to the Treasury Department, where nearly all these important papers rest. From the very beginning of our Government the law-making power declared that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be responsible to Congress and to Congress alone. Every act of that Department private and public, every paper filed there is under the custody of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me—I dislike to interrupt him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to be interrupted just now.

Mr. HARRIS. He answered the Senator from Alabama that a law which he believes to be constitutional—of course the official-tenure act—requires the Senate to review in respect to removals. As I understand that act, it expressly leaves the matters of suspensions in vacation to the discretion of the President. Does the Senator claim that he has a right to review the ground on which the President has made a suspension in vacation which the law leaves exclusively and wholly to the discretion of the President?

Mr. SHERMAN. No one knows better than the venerable Senator that with these public files it is a question not of what we have a right to review, but what information we have a right to from the Executive Departments. I warrant you that I can show in the history of the Senator from Tennessee that he has been as persistent and as insistent upon the right to examine into those papers as any one else, for he has himself called for it over and over again and it has never been denied. As to what we will do with these papers, whether we will steal them, or burn them, or destroy them, we do not allow the Executive Departments to put any queries to us. We will not put any inquiries to the President of the United States, because the independence of that great office demands that he should not be inquired of for his reason.

Mr. HARRIS rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not yield any further, because I have been drawn into this debate. The position of independence of that great office demands that he should be treated with respect, but every paper upon which he acts on any duty whatever, executive or legislative, is ours as well as his. The papers filed with him to induce the removal of an officer are the very papers that we ought to consider to determine the very question of the appointment. Whether we should use them for one purpose or another is not now the matter in dispute; it may come up at some other more appropriate time; but I say now and repeat, that from the beginning of the Government to this time those public archives have been as open to members of Congress as they have been to any branch of the Government, and the law which is before me, one of the oldest laws upon the statute-book, has been kept there unimpaired and unbroken from the beginning of the Government to this time, by which the head of that great Department may not only be compelled to bring all the papers he has in the Department, whatever they are, private or public, but may be compelled before either House to be examined and re-examined and cross-examined.

Sir, I was examined by the former Senator from Delaware now the Secretary of State when he was chairman of the Committee on Finance. I was examined before that committee day after day, and I never hesitated to answer any question put to me except one, and that was when they asked me what I intended in the future. Then I respectfully declined, because I wished to keep my own secrets in my own way as to what I intended to do in the future, but whatever was done in the past was exposed in the most open manner, and I was cross-examined not only as to what was done, but as to the reasons why it was done, and this was the public record. Not only was that the case there, but in the House of Representatives the same course was admitted. The House was then largely Democratic, and called before their respective committees the executive officers of the Government and examined them day after day. I was examined there in the spring of 1878 at one time for three or four days upon every question great or small connected with the problem of the resumption of specie payments, and I am happy to say that in that case I believe both the committee itself and I by that examination were greatly instructed and greatly benefited, and to the public good, too.

So in executive nominations (I do not intend to go into detail) there was no halting then about executive papers or any nice distinctions as to the why or wherefore or for what purpose they were to be used. They were not only produced, but in one case, which excited so much dispute in the Hayes administration, I followed them at the invitation of the Democratic committee and went to that committee and told them not only about the papers as to what they contained but the why and the wherefore, how it would affect the public interest to do this and to do that, and answered all their questions fully.

I say to you, gentlemen, as I have said to some of you privately, that I think you are making here a false issue that will return to plague the inventor. I would not recognize that any paper in any Department of this Government is beyond the reach of this body or the other House. The other House has the plain right; they are charged there with the power of impeaching; where motives may be inquired into; where the cause of acts may be inquired into; and connected with this broad jurisdiction, the power to impeach every officer of the Government of the United States, are they not armed with the power of ascertaining the facts? They legislate on every question within the jurisdiction of the United States. Have they not the power to inquire of the Departments of this or that fact, or this or that paper, that may affect their judgment upon the passage of laws? So have we, with broader powers even, because here we have the power to try impeachment; we are judges of the highest court of last resort; we are executive officers also, because we participate to a certain extent with the President in making an appointment. No important appointment can be made in this Government except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. How is that consent to be obtained? Is it by the suppression of papers? Is it by the denial of information? Is it by narrow, I may say false, pretexts? Is it by overriding the customs of nearly a century of republican life? No; we ought to maintain and uphold to the utmost the power of the Senate to call for any papers or any information, stopping only at the bounds of courtesy which the law of gentlemen imposes upon them not to press an inquiry where it may impair the dignity and honor of another branch of the Government; but short of that, and only short of that, we are entitled to all the information that is contained in those papers.

But, Mr. President, this is far from my intention when I rose. I merely rose to debate the question raised about silver dollars; I have said all I desire to say about this matter; and I again repeat now, I do not wish to do any injustice to the Treasurer of the United States or to the Secretary of the Treasury. I wish them to explain why they did not redeem these silver dollars. I believe that they will give some satisfactory explanation. I have not read the papers, but as to the plain law there can be no doubt, that when any man, be he a negro laborer on a plantation, be he a poor hod-carrier who has his $10 in money and does not like to carry that around with him in that form, or the bank to which the Senator alludes, every one of them has the right to go to any treasury and there deposit his silver dollars and demand for them a more convenient form representing that money.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if, when he was acting as Secretary of the Treasury, he did not refuse to deliver up papers relating to the removal of Dement from office?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I do not remember such a name at all.

Mr. PUGH. I am informed that while you were acting as Secretary of the Treasury a call was made upon you for the papers relating to the removal of Dement, and that you refused to deliver them up for the reason that we had no right to make the inquiry.

Mr. SHERMAN. Dumont?

Mr. PUGH. Dement or Dumont.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was an officer at New Orleans by the name of Dumont. That is the nearest approach to the name that I can remember.

Mr. ALLISON. The naval officer.

Mr. SHERMAN. The naval officer at New Orleans. I know of no such case. I am quite sure the Senator will find himself mistaken in the facts. It may be that some outsider may have come there who wanted to see the papers, and I have uniformly declined that; but a member of Congress or a committee of Congress or either House were never denied any papers while I was Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. Can the Senator from Ohio point out any statute that gives to what he calls an insider a greater right of access to the public documents than an outsider; that gives to him as a Senator a greater right of access to the public documents than any private gentleman in the country of equal respectability?

Mr. SHERMAN. My answer is that as Congress is vested with legislative power, and the Senate is vested with legislative, executive, and judicial power, either has the necessary right inherent to a legislative body to demand and receive all information in any Department of the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. I am asking for a statement of the law. I want to be informed whether the law provides for any such thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to ask the Secretary to read the law.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator does not answer my question, I notice, nor try to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Secretary to read that section of the Revised Statutes as a conclusion to my remarks.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 248. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of the public credit; shall superintend the collection of the revenue; shall, from time to time, prescribe the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts and making returns; shall grant, under the limitations herein established, or to be hereafter provided, all warrants for moneys to be issued from the Treasury in pursuance of appropriations by law; shall make report, and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing, as may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and generally shall perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire now, inasmuch as this debate, I presume, is closed on an outside question that certainly was not before the Senate, to call up Senate bill No. 1394.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition shall be made of the resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that it may be informally laid aside.

Mr. MORGAN. I object. I am willing to have it laid aside informally, but not to go over on motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I said let it be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. LOGAN. For what purpose?

Mr. BLAIR. There should be a request that the regular order be laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Illinois was to have the floor by virtue of the original understanding.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; and I ask that Senate bill No. 1394 may be now considered.

Mr. BLAIR. If it is necessary that the proper order be entered, I ask that the educational bill be formally laid before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. That was agreed to. I will say to the Senator that it was laid aside informally.

Mr. BLAIR. If the regular order is informally laid aside and it is so recorded, that is sufficient.

Mr. LOGAN. That was the suggestion, and the Chair said it would be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood when the arrangement was made at 2 o'clock that the bill of the Senator from Illinois was embraced in the understanding, and it does not interfere with the regular order, which is the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. That is sufficient.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, with the testimony.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SCHOOL LOT IN CHICAGO.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the Senate proceed with the bill I have indicated.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property.

The preamble recites that the Chicago and Great Western Railroad Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Illinois, is constructing its railroad within the city of Chicago, and possesses, under its charter and under the ordinances of the city, a franchise to construct, maintain, and operate its railroad to Harrison street, for which purpose it has acquired, and is acquiring, by purchase and otherwise, the real estate lying between Taylor street and Harrison street, and west of Fifth avenue; that the United States owns the south half of block 87, in school-section addition to Chicago, which is in the center of the property so acquired and being acquired by the railroad company for terminal facilities, and is vacant, and is indispensable to the company in exercising its franchise and affording to the public the terminal facilities for which company has so purchased the property.

Therefore the bill proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to name, within ten days, a commission, to consist of three persons, officers of the United States, whose duty it shall be to ascertain and report to the Secretary, within twenty days after their appointment, the cash market value of the lot mentioned in the city of Chicago; and the Secretary is empowered to sell and convey the lot to the Chicago and Great Western Railroad Company at such price, not less in any event than the value thereof as appraised and reported by the commission, as he and the railroad company shall agree upon.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the bill in section 3, line 8, by striking out the word "eighth" and inserting "third," so as to correct an error in the date of the act there referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

WIDOW OF SAMUEL V. NOYES.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to the widow of Samuel V. Noyes, deceased, late messenger of the Senate, the sum of $720, being an amount equal to six months' salary as messenger aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator to withhold that motion until the regular order can be laid before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, that is understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. What has become of the resolution we have just been discussing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It went over at the request of Senators.

Mr. MORGAN. It can not go over in that way. I object to such a disposition of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not displaced. It went over informally.

Mr. MORGAN. By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider it.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will suspend until the regular order is laid before the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, pending which the Senator from Kansas moves——

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to know whether the order of business we have been considering this morning by unanimous consent of the Senate is to be interrupted and thrown aside upon the motion of one solitary Senator. That is the question I desire the Chair to decide.

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair is not called upon to decide that question. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That motion is in order at any time, and I ask that the vote of the Senate may now be taken on it. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the Senator had withdrawn his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds it to be his first duty to put the question on the motion of the Senator from Kansas rather than to reply to the Senator from Alabama, which the Chair would take great pleasure in doing otherwise. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas not to press that motion until we can have some understanding in regard to the resolution which has been under consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. We can have that understanding just as well to-morrow as to-night.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will agree by unanimous consent that the discussion on the resolution shall take place to-morrow and that his bill may be informally laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs to say that the understanding of the Chair is that the position of the resolution is not seriously interfered with and that it can be taken up to-morrow. That is the understanding the Chair has. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 8, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Friday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. On Monday last a bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], H. R. 5013, relating to contracts of common carriers and to certain obligatory duties and rights in connection with the carriage of property, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair thinks, on an examination of the bill, that the proper reference would be to the Committee on Commerce, and if there be no objection the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from its further consideration and the same will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. BARNES, for ten days, on account of important business.

REPORT OF HEALTH OFFICER, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FARQUHAR, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred House bill 3409, authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, having duly considered the same, would respectfully report in lieu thereof the following concurrent resolution and recommend its passage. The estimated cost of printing and binding is $1,130.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; 100 for the use of the Senate, 350 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,050 for the use of the said health officer of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. This report seems to propose to convert a bill into a concurrent resolution, something that has never been done in the House of Representatives. It has always been held in the House that it was not in order to amend a bill so as to convert it into a joint resolution or concurrent resolution, or to amend a joint resolution so as to make it a bill. The House has on one or two occasions concurred in Senate amendments making such changes. However, if no objection is made on the floor, the Chair will submit the report to the House.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, the change was made from the form of a bill to that of a concurrent resolution so as to save it from going on the Calendar, in order that this printing might be done as soon as possible. The matter to which it refers is now in type and simply waiting the action of the House to order the printing.

It was supposed by the committee, at the time of considering this matter, that it was as near a proper form as possible in which to place it; and, as it is a matter that does not involve a great amount of money, to enable the printing to be done at this time we have submitted the report in that form.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, by unanimous consent, the amendment proposed by the committee will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The concurrent resolution was adopted.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred Senate concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, together with the testimony taken by said committee, have considered the same, and have instructed me to favorably report the same back to the House and recommend its passage. The estimated cost of printing the additional copies referred to is $14,889.79.

The Senate concurrent resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 15,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, together with the testimony, be printed; 5,000 for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILSON B. GEORGE.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the bill (H. R. 3373) to correct the military record of Wilson B. George was reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. FINDLAY. I thought it was a favorable report; but on examination yesterday for the first time I learned that it was adversely reported. If in order I would like to have it taken from the table and placed upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had the right to have it placed there when reported. If there be no objection it will be now placed upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and the bill, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar and printed.

LAND GRANTS TO OREGON WAGON-ROADS.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back, with amendment, a resolution of inquiry referred to it, and ask immediate consideration of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears from the report of the commission appointed by the State of Oregon to investigate the wagon-road of the Willamette Valley and Cascade Mountain Wagon-Road Company, and the Oregon Central Military Wagon-Road Company's road, and The Dalles Military Wagon-Road Company's road, submitted to the Legislature of said State at its recent session:

1. That said Willamette Valley and Cascade Mountain Wagon-Road Company have neither built, graded, bridged, cleared, or constructed any road along the route designated by acts of Congress, nor on any route in accordance with the intent and meaning of said acts of Congress; and

2. That as to the Oregon Central Military Wagon-Road Company said commission finds no road built or repaired along their route, and that the only roads built were constructed by settlers and emigrants, and they are not the roads contemplated by said acts of Congress;

3. That as to The Dalles Military Wagon-Road Company said commission finds no road built by them from Canyon City east, nor repaired any built by settlers; and

Whereas the Legislature of Oregon has, by its senate joint memorial No. 6, memorialized Congress that the grants of land aforesaid, embracing 107,893 acres certified or patented June 30, 1880, to the Willamette Valley and Cascade Mountain Wagon-Road Company, and 361,327 acres certified or patented at said date to the Oregon Central Military Wagon-Road Company, and 126,910.23 acres certified and patented at said date to The Dalles Military Wagon-Road Company, and as to any other lands since certified or patented, be investigated by Congress; and that as to all those not patented or listed they be abolished, vacated, and annulled; and that as to those which have been patented Congress authorize suits to be instituted in the courts of the United States to vacate said grants and annul said lists and patents so issued, except where any of said lands have been acquired in good faith by innocent purchasers; and

Whereas by a previous resolution introduced in this Congress there is an omission of one of the aforesaid grants or roads, and a like omission in the certified joint memorial aforesaid from the Oregon Legislature which, in comparison with dates of grants therein recited, is an evident clerical error; and

Whereas this is submitted as a substitute for said former resolution: Therefore, Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, how much of the grants of lands aforesaid have been patented to each of said companies, assignees of the State of Oregon, and how much to each remains unpatented of the respective grants; and whether the Department of the Interior has entered into any investigation as to the compliance of said assignees with the conditions of the respective acts of Congress; and what action, if any, has been adopted as to suspension of any further patents.

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the resolution making inquiry in regard to grants of public lands to certain wagon-road companies, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the same back to the House with the following amendment. Add to the resolution this clause:

"Also to inform the House what evidence the Department has as to the construction of said roads, and also what evidence the Department had as to the construction upon which any patents may have issued by virtue of such grants."

And when said amendment is adopted your committee recommend the passage of said resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the Chair will proceed to call the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials from State and Territorial Legislatures are in order and resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Departments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is withdrawn from the files of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of States and Territories, and the Chair will, under the rules, now call the committees for reports.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. EVANS. I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the resolution of Mr. NEAL, January 26, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be authorized during this session only, until further order of the House, to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate of compensation now paid to session committee clerks respectively," have considered the same, and respectfully submit the following report:

The committee finds that the Committee on Claims has a wholly inadequate force to perform its work. There have been referred to the committee thus far over eleven hundred bills and four hundred petitions, as against five hundred and eleven up to the corresponding period of the last session. This committee, with the Committee on Invalid Pensions and War Claims, has now under consideration over four thousand bills of the six thousand bills introduced to date in the House. The Committee on War Claims has an assistant clerk and the Committee on Invalid Pensions has two assistant clerks. The change in the rules this session has greatly increased the labors of the Committee on Claims—in fact, nearly doubled the work. It is the opinion of this committee that a corresponding increase in the clerical force of the said committee should be allowed.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution, with this amendment:

Strike out the words "at the same rate of compensation now paid to session clerks respectively," and insert in their place the words "at the rate of $6 per day," the resolution then to read:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be authorized during this session only, until further order of the House, to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day."

The amendment was adopted, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPOONER. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to submit the following privileged report:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, providing for a clerk for the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, respectfully report:

That they have considered the same, and recommend the passage of the following substitute:

"Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic be authorized and empowered to employ a clerk during the sessions of the Forty-ninth Congress, to be paid at the rate of $6 per day, out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of speaking in the time of the gentleman from Rhode Island, although I am not without qualification in favor of the adoption of this resolution. I may be permitted to say that the Committee on Accounts had a similar resolution, giving a clerk to still another committee, and that the resolution will be reported with a similar recommendation.

Now, sir, I do not desire to urge the House very strongly one way or the other on a question of this kind; but I do desire to urge the House to take a logical and consistent position with reference to this question. This House has seen fit to decide there should be certain committees, and therefore has established the presumption that each committee has a certain amount of clerical work to do. The House has also decided that in case of certain of the committees they shall be grouped; and, therefore, the presumption is that in the opinion of the House the clerical work of those two committees can be performed by one clerk. Now, I am aware that such an arrangement is an awkward one, because by custom at least the chairman of the second committee has come to suppose that the clerk is primarily the clerk of the first committee, and, therefore, he finds it rather hard to call upon him for assistance. Therefore, if this arrangement is to continue, it should be decided on what days one committee should have the services of the clerk and on what days the other committee should have it.

But what I am chiefly interested in is that this House should not adopt this resolution from a temporary spasm of generosity, because I am afraid that might be followed by a temporary spasm of economy, in which the real interests of this House would suffer. I want to say, and I can say it without violation of any committee propriety, that, in my judgment, there are certain parts of the service of the House which require additional employés. I know that in the document-room, for instance, the work can not be done without additional employés; and, therefore, I trust the House will have no objection to giving some additional assistance in that quarter.

A MEMBER. What department did you refer to?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I was referring to the document-room. Other gentlemen may have noticed other occasions where they have found that the service of the House is inadequate. But all I want to say now, Mr. Speaker, is, that if this House proposes that every committee it chooses to create shall have a clerk, all right; but I do not want this resolution to pass and then hereafter members will repent of it as something approaching to extravagance, and, therefore, try to make the balance good by extra economy, which may happen in just the place where the convenience of members of the House is most concerned in having an adequate increase in the present service of the House.

Mr. SPOONER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps an ungracious thing to oppose the report of this committee, giving the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic a clerk. Like my colleague on the committee from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] I am indisposed to urge the House very strongly either way; but believing as I do that there is no present necessity for the services of a clerk to this committee, and knowing if a clerk is allowed that there are three or four other committees equally as much entitled to a clerkship, I shall be compelled to oppose the report of the Committee on Accounts in this respect.

Now, in the Forty-eighth Congress the House, in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, provided for fifteen annual clerkships and thirty-one special clerks, besides three assistant clerks for the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means. In addition to this, they provided seven session clerks by special resolutions, amounting in all to a clerical force for the Forty-eighth Congress of fifty-six.

In the Forty-ninth Congress, the present session, we have fifteen annual clerks, three assistant clerks for the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means, and thirty-one session clerks. We have up to this date allowed to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a clerk, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice a clerk, and to the Committee on Claims an assistant clerk, making in all fifty-two clerks provided for at present, four less than appeared on the roll of the last House.

But gentlemen in voting on this proposition must remember that the House in the revision of the rules has abolished three committees which existed in the last Congress, namely, the Committee on Public Health, the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and the Committee on the Tenth Census, to which three clerks, I believe, were assigned.

Mr. BEACH. No, the gentleman is mistaken; the Committee on the Public Health never had a clerk.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true; that committee had not a clerk, but the other two committees had. The gentleman from New York is correct.

But while there seems to be an apparent reduction of the clerical force of the House over what existed in the last Congress, it is in part caused by the dropping of two of the committees of the last House which had clerks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming directly to the question at issue, so that the House may know whether or not this committee is entitled to a clerk, I have requested the Clerk to prepare an exhibit showing the number of reports on resolutions and bills reported to the House from that committee in the last Congress. That result I shall now lay before you. The Committee on Manufactures, that is now grouped with the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, reported to the last Congress just two bills, while the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic reported four, making in all six reports from these two committees. This committee, as I have said, is grouped with the Committee on Manufactures, and the work is assigned to one clerk for both of these committees. They reported only six bills in the last House, and we have no reason to suppose that that number will be increased during this Congress.

In conclusion I want to say that if we have the courage of our convictions and assign these clerks for the individual use of members, then we ought to pass a resolution giving every member of the House a clerk; and if these clerks are assigned to committees that have no great or pressing duties to perform and the chairman by reason of the fact is largely the beneficiary, then I must protest against this action until the House by resolution provides each member with a clerk.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the gentleman from Missouri be kind enough to inform us as to the number of clerks in the last Congress and the number in this? I did not understand exactly his statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. I said that the total clerical force in the Forty-eighth Congress amounted to fifty-six, while the force at the present time, including the assistant clerk which has just been allowed to the Committee on Claims, amounts to fifty-two, and that the House in this session has abolished three of the committees which existed in the last Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to see every committee of the House that needs the exclusive services of a clerk supplied with it. If one clerk, however, can perform the duties for two committees or three committees, then, so far as the committee is concerned, that is enough. Now, I suspect, I think I may go further and say that I practically know from the duties that many of these committees have performed in former Congresses, that one clerk is sufficient for two or more. The practice, however, has grown up to give some gentleman who happens to be chairman of one of these committees a clerk, really, so far as the roll is concerned, a clerk for the committee, but in fact a private clerk for the chairman.

I think this is a pretty expensive way to provide the favored few with clerical assistance, while the not favored few have to pay for their clerical assistance; and I think it is high time this House should understand the fact and the country should understand the fact that the favored few have their clerical assistance paid for, and paid for pretty expensively, while the many do not have it. I undertake to say that the clerks of each of these committees receive sufficient pay in one Congress to provide at least one clerk for three members.

As gentlemen know, every Senator has his clerk at the public expense, and you and I vote year by year the money to pay them. Now, one of two things is wrong. Each Senator should not have a clerk at the public expense or each member should have such a clerk. We have just as much work to do as the Senators have, and I think, in fact, many of us have more work than they have to do. If there be odium in giving a member of Congress a clerk we incur that odium when we make the appropriation to pay clerks for the Senators and have not the courage to demand the same privilege for ourselves. For my part I shall vote from this on against the giving a clerk to each one of the smaller committees, hoping that practice will be cut up by the roots and that either the Senators will be deprived of their clerks or that we shall have the courage to demand for ourselves what we concede to Senators.

I shall vote against the resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. In offering this resolution to provide the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman with a clerk, I did it for two reasons. In the first place, it is beneath the dignity of this House to make and constitute a committee and refuse it the ordinary means of transacting business. It is too small a matter for the representatives of fifty millions of people to descend to. I place it first upon the ground of principle, that there either ought not to be a committee or the committee ought to have a clerk; and I will say here very freely that if the committee is abolished I will make no objection whatever; but if it is allowed to stand, I insist upon its being treated with the dignity that is worthy of this House.

In the second place, that committee needs a clerk—I say it upon full consideration—more than one-third of the committees now constituted by this House. Take, for instance, the question of a commission to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic. There is at the other end of the Capitol, about to be passed, the Blair bill upon that subject, which will come to this committee. We have various propositions in the shape of bills referred to that committee on the same subject. We are deluged with letters from the whole country, from temperance men of the standing of Neal Dow and that class of men, who want to be heard before us. We were visited no later than this morning by a representative of the brewers of this country, who want to be heard by this committee. We have to sit more hours investigating that subject than the number of hours that some other committees will sit during the whole session.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the House has not provided stenographers for the work to which he refers.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Not that I know of.

Mr. DOCKERY. The House has provided two stenographers for the work of committees.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Those stenographers can not sit there to do the work of the committee, although they may be called upon to reduce to writing the evidence and arguments. In the Forty-eighth Congress fifty-six bills and resolutions were referred to that committee and they had a great deal of business in attending to matters growing out of the bills referred to them.

I know also that the clerk of the Committee on Manufactures, who is attending in the best manner he can to the business of this committee, is required to be present at his committee on the same day that ours meets. We are occupying a secondary position in reference to that committee.

Now I insist, Mr. Speaker, that this is unjust discrimination. There are only four committees in this House that are not supplied with clerks, and it looks like a travesty on the word "reform," that the House should commence reforming in the work of committees by cutting off clerks from four committees. If, as the gentleman from Illinois said, one clerk can do the work of two, or three, or four committees, very well; the proper thing is to consolidate the committees, and let one committee do the work of two, or three, or four. To that I make no objection, but I insist this committee shall not be discriminated against. And I will say to the gentlemen on this side of the House that it is charged that there is an attempt to give this committee as little machinery as possible, for fear that it will take some action in the interest of the temperance element of the country. I see no necessity for lying under that imputation, which certainly ought not to be true.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the House ought to look at this report of the Committee on Accounts with any regard to what other committees have heretofore been assigned clerks. The question is simply whether this particular committee should be properly equipped for the work that it is required to perform. I undertake to say that there is no committee of this House to whose action more people look with interest than this Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. If there is any one question that is arousing all the religious, all the moral, all the patriotic interests of the country, it is the question: By what moral influence, by what moral suasion, can we best promote temperance in this country? There are those who differ as to the best means of attaining this end and as to what kind of legislation will best promote the cause; but I have yet to see the man who is a good citizen and who is opposed to legislating upon this great question in the manner which will best advance the interests of temperance. If this committee has done nothing in the past, it should do something now. It should at least give to the country such statistics and such facts as will enable the people occupying both sides of this great question to judge what is best for them to do. For one, while I have never indorsed the prohibition doctrine, I have never seen the day, and I hope I never will see the day, when I will refuse by any act of mine to promote temperance and good government among the people of this country.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, as the action of the House upon the resolution now pending may serve to guide the committee in the consideration of other questions of this character, it seemed desirable that the expression of opinion should be freely permitted, as it has been in the brief remarks made here upon both sides of this question. Although I am of the minority of the Committee on Accounts, as far as party politics is concerned, I have been directed by the majority to make this report. This is a matter which I think that committee or a majority of the committee understand runs to the question of providing for the proper performance of the business of the House. The majority of the committee, I believe, think that where a committee has been provided for under the rules of the House and where that committee has business to transact, it is quite proper that it should be furnished with a clerk to assist in the transaction of its business. Repeated complaints have come to the attention of the Committee on Accounts about the inability of several of these committees to procure the assistance of the clerks who have been in part assigned to them. In the Forty-fifth Congress we had, counting clerks and assistants, eighteen annual clerks and thirty-one session clerks, both classes of whom were provided for in the general appropriation bill. There were also by special resolution seven other clerks provided for during the session. During the present session we have up to the present time, including the clerk provided for by the resolution which passed the House this morning, fifty-two clerks, four less in number than were employed in the last Congress.

I certainly have no disposition to urge upon the House the incurring of any unreasonable or extravagant expense. I am quite in accord with such line of practical economy as can be carried out for regulating all these matters of expenditure; but I do believe in dealing with these matters in a practical, common-sense way, and it is because I believe that, as a practical matter and in the interest perhaps of true economy, clerks should be provided for these committees, in order that the public business intrusted to them may be properly attended to—it is for that reason, sir, that I am in favor of the passage of this resolution, or rather of the substitute reported from the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that the four committees which are now without clerks are all seeking to be provided with them, and that the cost will aggregate about $5,000.

Mr. SPOONER. There are only four committees of the House which are not provided with clerks. If the resolution now under consideration is adopted, there will be only three not provided for. If the resolution which I have in my hand, and which also I am instructed to report favorably, is adopted, there will be but two committees left without clerks. I do not see any reason for making a distinction between this committee, nor, indeed, between any of the committees which have no clerks and quite a number of those which at present have clerks. I therefore move the adoption of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Accounts, which will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic be authorized and empowered to employ a clerk during the session of the Forty-ninth Congress, to be paid at the rate of $6 a day out of the contingent fund of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON VENTILATION AND ACOUSTICS.

Mr. SPOONER. I present another privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the accompanying resolution of Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, has considered the same, and herewith reports favorably thereon, recommending that the blank therein be filled by inserting the word "six" between the words "paid" and "dollars," and by adding at the end of the resolution the words "of the House," and that as so amended the resolution be adopted.

The resolution as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics be authorized and empowered to employ a clerk, to be paid $6 a day during the session of the Forty-ninth Congress, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GREEN], the chairman of the committee to which this resolution relates.

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, if the necessity for a committee clerk is to be determined by the amount of work which the committee has done heretofore, I contend that few committees of this House are more entitled to a clerk than the committee over which I have the honor to preside. During the Forty-eighth Congress we were in session regularly on committee days almost without intermission throughout the two sessions. More than that, we held many night meetings, extending from 8 o'clock frequently until 12 or 1 o'clock. We had before us experts and scientists from all parts of the country. I am sure that the amount of work which was done by our committee eminently entitled us to a clerk. After all our deliberations and although a report was prepared formulated by the committee, yet, owing to some cause which I am unable to state, that report was never brought before the House; consequently the committee will at this Congress have to go over much of the work which was done in the last; and I contend that the same necessity which existed in the Forty-eighth Congress for a clerk for this committee continues in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Again, Mr. Speaker, if the proposition submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE] to give this committee charge of the ventilation of all the public buildings in the city of Washington should become a law, as it is likely to do, our labors will be immensely increased; and in that case I am sure no committee of this House will have greater need for a clerk than the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.

I am sure every gentleman on this floor will agree with me that there are few subjects which concern this House more than the subject of ventilation. It will be conceded that there are very few halls on this continent which are worse ventilated than this Hall in which we daily sit. Some change with a view to improvement in this respect must be made. The necessity for it is recognized on all hands. Therefore I think the House should be liberal and give us the facilities we require in order to enable us to arrive at a rational conclusion.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, I believe that what has been said concerning the resolution last adopted by the House applies with equal force to the resolution now under consideration. It therefore seems to me unnecessary to have any further discussion, and unless some gentleman particularly desires to debate the matter I will ask for the question on agreeing to the amendments and then on the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken on the amendments proposed by the committee, there were—ayes 56, noes 20.

Mr. STORM. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. SPOONER and Mr. STORM.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes 24.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw the demand for a further count, and shall raise the point on the adoption of the resolution.

No further count being demanded, the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The question being taken on adopting the resolution as amended, there were—ayes 79, noes 19.

Mr. STORM. I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

The Speaker, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. SPOONER and Mr. STORM.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 115, noes 28.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw the demand for a further count.

No further count being demanded, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed to call the committees for reports to be referred to the appropriate calendars.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to dispense with this call of the committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-thirds vote.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER said: In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds have not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MORRISON. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 53.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not ask for a further count.

So the motion of Mr. MORRISON was not agreed to; and the Speaker proceeded to call the standing and select committees for reports to be placed upon the appropriate Calendars.

SAMUEL C. PECK, JR.

Mr. PIDCOCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4131) for the relief of Samuel C. Peck, jr.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 222) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia; and

A bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the Territory of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

TAXATION OF FRACTIONAL PARTS OF GALLON OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve my time. The House has gone into committee, as I understand it, for the purpose of permitting my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to submit some remarks on the silver bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman will be reserved.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following:

"And all taxes imposed by this act shall be paid in standard silver coin."

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, the silver question, properly speaking, has been ably discussed in both wings of the Capitol during the present session of Congress. I wish to address myself to a somewhat different line of argument from that which has been pursued by other gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject. Before proceeding, however, I must congratulate the people and this House upon the auspicious fact that we have at last reached the time when all are eager to hear. Many have longed to see this day, but have died without the sight.

Mr. Chairman, the thing which most astonishes me in the history of our political evolution is the fact, that as a rule, neither the people nor their lawmakers have ever comprehended the vast importance of an adequate, safe, and permanent financial policy.

The relation of money to the every-day life of the people, the effect of an increase or decrease in its volume, the necessity of lodging the power to control the volume of money within reliable hands, these are all questions which seem to be but feebly understood by the great body of the American people.

If I were asked to name the present great duty of this Congress I should answer without hesitation, it is to establish once for all an adequate, permanent financial system that shall serve as a basis for economic prosperity as long as our flag shall float; a system under which there shall be no privileged classes, and under which the rights of the humble laborer and the capitalist shall be alike secure. It will not be pretended that we even approximate to this condition at present. As an original proposition it would seem easy enough to establish such a system, and it would be an easy matter now, were it not for the vested wrongs with which we have to deal.

There are two ever-present disturbing forces connected with our monetary system—the public debt and the national banks. They are the evil outgrowths of the civil war, and the nation will ever be in peril until they are swept out of existence. The hostility of the national banks to silver coinage is only one phase of a conspiracy which had its origin in the early stages of the civil war, and which has never yet been overthrown. The rebellion was overthrown, but this conspiracy never has been; and it will require all the power of the country, now happily reunited, to uproot it. It has grown with our growth and strengthened with our strength until to-day it defies the law and the power of the Government. I propose to trace some of the features of this conspiracy and of the reaction in public sentiment which is now in progress.

It will be remembered that when the legal-tender act first passed the House it provided for a full legal-tender paper currency. The exceptions which now appear in the law and upon the back of our Treasury notes were inserted in the Senate. This was for the benefit of those who were speculating in two things—gold and blood. When the bill came back to the House with these unpatriotic amendments, which constituted the ultimatum of the gold gamblers and bullion brokers, there was no alternative. The terms had to be accepted or the nation must perish. They were not accepted, however, without a protest. I now wish the Clerk to read the remarks of Thaddeus Stevens, Congressional Globe, part 1, 1861 and 1862, page 900.

I approach the subject with more depression of spirits than I ever approached any question. * * * I have a melancholy foreboding that we are about to consummate a cunningly devised scheme which will carry great injury and great loss to all classes of people throughout the Union, except one. No act of legislation of this Government was ever hailed with so much delight throughout the whole length and breath of this Union, by every class of people without exception, as the bill we passed and sent to the Senate. Congratulations from all classes, merchants, traders, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers, poured in upon us from all quarters. * * * It is true there was a doleful sound came up from the caverns of bullion brokers and from the saloons of the associated banks. Their cashiers and agents were soon on the ground, and persuaded the Senate, with but little deliberation, to mangle and destroy what it cost the House months to digest, consider, and pass. They fell upon the bill in hot haste and so disfigured and deformed it that its very father would not know it. Instead of being a beneficial and invigorating measure it is now positively mischievous. It now creates money and by its very terms declares it a depreciated currency. It makes two classes of money. One for banks and brokers, and another for the people. It discriminates between the different classes of creditors, allowing the rich capitalist to demand gold and compelling the ordinary lender of money on individual security to receive notes which the Government had purposely discredited.—Congressional Globe, part 1, 1861-'62, page 900.

My amendment is to exempt from the operations of the legal-tender clause the officers and soldiers of the Army and Navy and those who supply them with provisions, and thus to put them upon the same footing with the Government creditors who hold their bonds. I hope they may not be thought less meritorious than the money-changers. I trust it will be adopted as an amendment to the Senate amendment, so that if this pernicious system is to be adopted, if the beauty of the original bill is to be entirely impaired, those who are fighting our battles and the widows and children of those who are lying in their graves in every part of the country, killed in defense of the Government, may be placed upon no worse footing than those who held the bonds of the Government and the coin of the country.—Ibid.

It is believed by psychological writers that there are great-souled men, defenders of the human race, who when great injuries are about to be inflicted upon mankind feel for the time being all the agony and all the sorrow that is to come upon the world through the impending wrong. Thaddeus Stevens seems to have tasted the wormwood and the gall for the whole country on this occasion.

But the crime was committed, notwithstanding these burning words of Mr. Stevens, and a market was created by law for the pittance of gold then in the country, and which was exclusively in private hands. Importers must now have it to pay customs duties, and the holders of public securities must have their interest in gold, and so the gold gambler had everything his own way.

The unpatriotic manner in which they used the advantage which the law gave them is graphically set forth in the report of Hon. William Pitt Fesenden, Secretary of the Treasury, December 6, 1864, pages 22 and 23:

The experience of the few past months can not have failed to convince the most careless observer that, whatever may be the effect of a redundant circulation upon the price of coin, other causes have exercised a greater and more deleterious influence. In the course of a few days the price of this article rose from about $1.50 to $2.85 in paper for $1 in specie, and subsequently fell, in as short a period, to $1.87, and then again rose as rapidly to $2.50; and all without any assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease in the circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit, or other similar influence on the market, tending to occasion a fluctuation so violent. It is quite apparent that the solution of the problem may be found in the unpatriotic and criminal efforts of speculators, and probably of secret enemies, to raise the price of coin, regardless of the injury inflicted upon the country, or desiring to inflict it. All such attempts should be indignantly frowned upon by a patriotic community, and the efforts of all good citizens invoked to counteract such nefarious schemes. A law providing for the exemplary punishment of combinations for such a purpose might tend to vindicate, if it could not fully protect, the public rights in this regard, and should be, so far as possible, rigidly enforced.

Oh for such a rebuke from the head of the Treasury to-day! It would sound like another edict from Nehemiah against the usurers and despoilers of Israel. It would resurrect the hope of the country and cause it to spring into newness of life. And as the rebuke would die away across the continent, how sweeter than the notes of the Dorian flute would it strike the listening ear of suffering labor in every hamlet of the land.

By manipulating things in the manner described here by Mr. Fessenden, the parties to such transactions were of course enabled to reap vast fortunes out of the misfortunes of the Republic.

But to give these cormorants full sway, and to guard them against surprises from every quarter, four other things had to be accomplished in addition to the exceptions which they had placed upon the greenbacks.

First. The Government, although engaged in a war for its life, must by law place a limit upon its right to issue its own non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes.

Second. It must permit Treasury notes, depreciated in the manner so forcibly described by Mr. Stevens, to be exchanged at their face value for untaxable bonds bearing coin interest.

Third. A law must be passed authorizing the interest on bonds and other securities to be paid quarterly, and another to authorize the Secretary to anticipate the payment of interest without rebate.

Fourth. The holders of these bonds obtained in the manner just described, must be allowed to bank upon them and to draw back from the Treasury 90 per cent. of the amount of currency they had paid for them. These things were, all and singular, accomplished by acts of Congress prior to July 1, 1864. Their grip upon the country was now complete. Now, note the result. The price of greenbacks as compared with gold during the calendar year of 1864—the year these enactments were completed—was but 49.2 cents on the dollar, and the second half of that calendar year only 42.8.

I am now at the period when the political prophecy of Thomas H. Benton was to be fulfilled. That distinguished and patriotic Senator said, in a conversation with Silas Wright shortly after President Jackson vetoed the bill to recharter the United States Bank:

> Jackson has not slain the bank. The bank is a wounded tigress. She has fled to the jungles. By and by she will spring again upon the country, bringing her whelps with her!

What a vigorous prophecy and how literally has it been fulfilled! Sir, the extraordinary powers conferred by law upon the banking corporations of to-day read like the harsh terms imposed by some merciless conqueror upon a fallen people, and such they really are.

For the purpose of fixing beyond cavil the evil results which followed the advent of the national banks into our financial policy, I wish the Clerk to read the following extract from the report of Hon. William Pitt Fessenden, Secretary of the Treasury, same date as above, page 19:

> It is observable that, notwithstanding the apparently large circulation of paper money issued under the authority of the various acts of Congress before enumerated, its scarcity in the market has occasioned no slight embarrassment in the negotiation of loans. This can be accounted for only upon the supposition that large amounts are carefully held by the people, thereby exhibiting their confidence in its character and value, and that the impetus given to trade of every description by the large and increasing wants of Government requires a largely increased amount of the circulating medium. A rise of prices tends, proportionately, in the same direction.

There does not seem to have been any of the features of a forced loan connected with the money then in circulation, as will be readily seen. It will be observed that at the time of the advent of the banks, when the people were doing business upon Government currency exclusively—adequate in amount—the country was prosperous, notwithstanding the enormous strain of the war, and the money was all out in circulation, where it always will be when financial affairs are in a healthy condition.

Let me pause here to state a universal rule governing the movement of currency under normal conditions. When money is plentiful prices rule high; the money then leaves the centers, seeks investment, and finds a lodgment with the great body of the people.

When from any cause the circulating medium becomes scarce, prices fall, and the little money that is left returns to the centers and becomes gorged there. When money becomes redundant at the money centers you may know the extremities are suffering, and you may at the same time understand unerringly the cause of it. Secretary Fessenden found this rule in full operation at the close of the year 1864, for he says, notwithstanding the enormous issues which had taken place, the money was nevertheless all out in the hands of a confiding people, and the Government could scarcely get hold of it even by the most tempting offers.

Mr. Chairman, considering Secretary Fessenden in the light of his wise and humane policy, he has never had a successor. Following him came McCulloch, the friend of the banks, of contraction, of bonds, and of a perpetual debt; and with him came a whole brood of evils, which were turned loose upon, and have ever since afflicted, the country. For the purpose of fixing the responsibility of our present disordered and murderous policy, I read from Secretary McCulloch's first annual report, December 4, 1865, one year after Mr. Fessenden's report, which I have just quoted:

> "The people are now comparatively free from debt. * * * The expansion has now reached [of money] such a point as to be absolutely oppressive to a large portion of the people, while at the same time it is diminishing labor and is becoming subversive of good morals. * * * The remedy, and the only remedy within the control of Congress, is, in the opinion of the Secretary, to be found in the reduction of the currency."

What a picture! People out of debt and absolutely burdened with money! Able to live without work, their morals in danger, and McCulloch invoking the power of Congress to relieve the people of their money, to set them to work, and thus preserve the morals of the country! Congress responded to this pathetic appeal with alacrity, and from that day to this the people have never been burdened with money, nor have they lacked the sanctifying influence of debt, hard work, and scanty living. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the people were indeed out of debt at that time, and money was plentiful. Having paid their own debts, they were ready to move upon the public debt and pay that also. This was the real apprehension that filled the mind of Mr. McCulloch; and the present hostility to silver had its origin with the same men and springs from the same class of motives.

But I wish to direct the attention of the House to the most notable peculiarity in the condition of the country at the time Mr. McCulloch took control of the Treasury Department. There was not only a vast paper circulation out in the hands of the people, but it was then almost exclusively in use among twenty-five millions of people then living in the North. That section of the country was out of debt. The South had just laid down her arms and had returned with her population of ten or twelve millions, who, speaking approximately, were without a dollar. Their country was dismantled and torn by the ravages of war, and the freedmen, four millions in number, had been transformed into wage-workers and must be paid like other people.

I assert here and maintain that if the volume of currency had remained as it was at the close of the war, instead of there having been a redundancy, there would not have been enough to have answered the demands of the whole country reunited. But notwithstanding the enormous addition that was made to our money-using population by the return of the South, Mr. McCulloch entered actively upon the destruction of our currency and its conversion into bonds. Was there ever such a crime committed in the history of the world—ever a more diabolical attempt to compel a people already groaning under burdens too great to be borne, to make bricks without straw? But these conspirators were actuated by a relentless spirit, and they moved right ahead regardless of consequences. The main purposes had in view were the following: to place the public debt beyond the possibility of payment, to increase its amount, and to secure for all time the right and power to control the volume of money.

Next came the credit-strengthening act of 1869, in which the Government pledged itself to pay the public debt in coin or its equivalent. This legislation, it will be observed, followed upon the heels of the contraction policy inaugurated by McCulloch, and it in fact increased the value of Government bonds fully $600,000,000. The following year the funding measure of 1870 was passed, whereby the currency bonds were all funded into coin bonds. To show the malignant and deliberate design of this act, I wish the clerk to read the following, which is taken from the report of Hon. John Sherman, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee in 1867:

> It has been proposed that Congress, by joint resolution, declare that the 5-20 bonds are redeemable only in gold. This, instead of settling the question, will only create division in parties, and the resolution when passed will be subject to agitation and repeal. This consideration induces your committee, without deciding the question, to propose the substitution of new bonds, clear and explicit in their terms, for the old bonds, as they become redeemable.

You will here notice that the design to openly head off the people, and to preclude subsequent Congresses from paying the debt in the currency of the contract was openly declared as far back as 1867, nineteen years ago. The purpose of this war on silver is to prevent the people from paying the debt in the coin of the contract. It is a shot from the same battery, and from the same captain of the battery, as I shall show. They come on by reliefs, however.

Three years later, 1873—the year the great panic began—silver was demonetized by stealth, and the gold dollar was declared to be the unit of value. This left the bonds payable in gold coin only. Following this—the panic still raging with greatest fury—Congress passed the act of June 20, 1874, the fourth section of which gave the banks the power to retire their circulating notes in whole or in part, and pointed out the method by which it could be done. This was to enable the banks to set their houses in order, and to prepare them for what was to follow the next year, so that they might stand from under, while everybody else was to be caught in the dead-fall. The next year, 1875, the act for the so-called resumption of specie payments was passed, which, with silver demonetized, meant gold payments exclusively.

Does anybody now believe there was an honest purpose to pay our obligations in gold? Every intelligent man knows, and every sincere man will admit, that the purpose was to place the larger share of this debt clear beyond the reach of payment. Pay the debt in gold? Why from July 1, 1867, to September 30, 1876, the Treasury sold upon the market in Europe and America $522,000,000 of gold, after having met all its current coin obligations. This record is furnished by the then Secretary of the Treasury himself. This was not done to meet current obligations. The resumption act was approved January 14, 1875, and yet the record shows that the Treasury sold $40,000,000 of gold upon the market after the passage of the resumption act, and then they turned around and issued and sold bonds to buy it back again.

This gold accumulated as high as $77,000,000 in one year and $76,000,000 in another during the period between 1867 and 1876. Why was it not used to bring the greenbacks to par under their boasted theory of paying all obligations in gold coin? Plainly, it was not so used for the reason that these manipulators wished the greenback to remain a degraded currency, to be retired from circulation as soon as possible by converting it into bonds. They preferred to have the Government buy its own depreciated paper at a discount and then reissue it again to the people at par until such time as they could get rid of it entirely. Truly, these were eminent guardians of the public faith and credit.

But this same resumption act also provided for the destruction of our greenback currency. It was to be redeemed in gold coin, and the coin was to be obtained by a new issue of interest-bearing long-time bonds, thus destroying our non-interest-bearing currency by converting it into interest-bearing debt. Following these two enactments the banks and the Treasury sprang into the arena like gladiators, and vied with each other in the destruction of our money, until our heroic people everywhere cried out in very agony. Is not every count in this indictment, in this long list of outrages true? Is there a member here who can deny a single one of them? There has been one constant accretion of power in behalf of these corporations and the moneyed classes from the breaking out of the civil war down to the present day.

Why, sir, each act which I have named was a separate, cruel, cold-blooded victory for avarice. They all united to fill our youthful country on the one hand with wrecked fortunes, suicides, helpless poverty, and broken hearts, and on the other with exceptional individual fortunes, some of them so monstrous in magnitude as to be quite beyond the grasp of the human intellect. Take one instance from among many. Mr. Vanderbilt at his death, which occurred a few weeks ago, left an estate valued at $220,000,000. It is hard to comprehend such a vast fortune as this. It can be better understood by comparison than in any other way. There are two Egyptian mummies down here at the National Museum—venerable-looking old fellows. They were probably laboring men in their day. They are estimated to be three thousand years old each. Now, if they had worked hard, pooled their earnings, lived to the present day, and laid up over and above their expenses $1 each for every day, in these three thousand years their joint accumulations would only amount to two millions one hundred and ninety thousand dollars.

If one of these prehistoric gentlemen, about whom our scientific men know little or nothing, had been born exempt from mortality 600,000 years B. V. (Before Vanderbilt), and had made an average saving of $1 per day during all of that period, Mr. Vanderbilt the day before his death could have bought him out and then had $1,000,000 left to invest in the Nickel-Plate Railway. These figures will not lie, and you can make the calculation for yourselves.

Mr. Vanderbilt's executor, if it were in accordance with the terms of the will, could give two hundred men employment at $1 per day each—Sundays and all—for three thousand years, and then have one million left. Estimating the total wealth of this country at $66,000,000,000, you can only give six thousand six hundred persons $10,000,000 each if you divide the whole country equally between them. If you were to divide the estimated wealth of this nation ($66,000,000,000) equally between three hundred men—twenty-five less than belong in this House, giving each an amount equal to Vanderbilt's wealth—there would not be a farthing left for the rest of mankind! Fortunes like this, sir, are the legitimate outgrowth of this conspiracy and of the pernicious system of monopolies which it has fastened upon us. It is not necessary for me to describe here the wonderful growth of monopolies during this period of national-bank rule, nor need I stop to show that they now rule with an iron rod all the leading branches of business within the Republic. Every man who has given the matter even a glancing look knows these things to be true. I must now pass on to

THE REACTION.

The history of this struggle between the people and the confederated monopolies, like every other similar struggle through which we have been called to pass, proves that the confidence reposed in the people by the framers of our Government was not misplaced. The reaction against the monstrous and tyrannical acts which I have enumerated first began among the people themselves. The waves first arose, so to speak, on this vast ocean of human sufferers, and God is still lashing it into fury for the purpose of purifying the waters. The year 1876 witnessed the organization of a small body of earnest and patriotic men under the leadership of the venerable Peter Cooper.

Without attempting to follow the progress of that political reformation, or to trace its salutary influence within other political organizations, it is sufficient to state that the Forty-fifth Congress called a halt, about-faced, and entered upon the difficult task of arresting and undoing this baleful tendency in our civilization. The Bland act was first blood for the people. I shall not stop to show that which is well understood by the whole country, namely, that this class legislation, in addition to its other criminal features, had gone so far as to wrest from the people the control of all the great instruments of commerce, nor shall I stop here to animadvert upon that other correlative but sad truth, that, although this reaction began ten years ago, the people have not as yet regained full control over a single one of these agencies so indispensable to their welfare.

The first act, as I have stated, was that of February 28, 1878, known as the Bland act, to reopen the mints to the coinage of standard silver dollars. This was followed by the act of May 30, 1878, to stop further destruction of the greenbacks. This in turn was followed by the passage of what are known as the Stanley Matthews resolutions in the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress. These resolutions, following the spirit of the Bland act, declared it to be the right of the Government to pay all Government obligations in standard silver dollars. I wish now to call attention to the similarity in the fate of the Bland bill with that of the legal-tender act sixteen years before. When this beneficent measure passed the House it provided for unrestricted coinage on private account. But here again the hand of Esau was held out to deceive a blind and suffering people, and the Bland bill was accordingly so amended—in the Senate, mark you—as to practically restrict the coinage to two millions per month, and then only on Government account. This was not open and frank legislation. It was disingenuous and done for the purpose of committing both the coinage of silver and its disbursement to unfriendly hands. From that day to this the Treasury Department has been under the control of those who brought about the demonetization of silver and those who are opposed to its circulation, instead of under the control of those who sought to secure its restoration. The conduct of the Treasury officials since silver was restored is well understood, and amounts to a complete defiance of the law and of the will of the people. You can make nothing less out of it. To prove this let facts be submitted to a candid world.

The Clerk will please read a quotation from a letter written by Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the Honest Money League, January 30, 1879. I find it quoted on page 1201, volume 37 of the RECORD, first session Forty-sixth Congress:

> I have a clear conviction that the forced payment of the silver dollar to public creditors would tend to depreciate it and cause it at once to be sold in the market at less than par. * * * While it is the duty of the Government to coin different kinds of money, a public policy dictates it should be within the power of the citizen at his option to demand either form of lawful money.

This letter was written January 30, 1879, and during the very session of the Forty-fifth Congress that passed the Stanley Matthews resolutions that declared it to be the right of the Government to pay all of its obligations in silver coin.

This is the bold manner in which this law has been violated. It is the duty of the Government to coin money, he says, but it is the right of the creditor to set the law at defiance by refusing to take it! This places the holder of Government securities above the law, above Congress, and gives him an absolute veto over the statute. Now, sir, it is the plain duty of every officer of this Government, from the highest to the lowest, to yield cheerful and complete obedience to the law. But I submit that it is a fact, known to everybody, that the Treasury officials under every Administration since the passage of the acts to stop the destruction of the greenback and to coin silver dollars, have been hostile to both these forms of currency, and they have been actively averse to the enforcement of these laws in good faith. In this obtrusive hostility these officials have been supported by the whole power of the confederated national banks and other capitalists at home and abroad.

This is nullification in its worst form. It seems to have been deemed sufficient that they should know that the corporations and brokers were dissatisfied with the law, and accordingly their wishes have been respected as more imperative than the plain letter of the statute. Every administration since the passage of these laws, either from the throne or from the cabinet, have made war—sometimes open, sometimes covert—upon these useful, non-burdensome, and needful forms of currency. Notwithstanding this hostility, however, the tide has been constantly rising. It pervades the country; it has reached this city; it has swept up Capitol Hill and is now in upon the floor both of the Senate and the House of the Forty-ninth Congress. It is rising rapidly, and if this body does not wish to be submerged it must step upon higher ground than has heretofore been occupied.

I have already alluded to the act of May 30, 1878. The effect of this act was to repeal the most obnoxious feature of the so-called resumption act, and to stop the redemption, properly speaking, of the greenback currency. Since the passage of that act greenbacks have not been redeemable, in the proper sense of that term, but have been merely convertible into coin. That is to say, the Government is authorized and required now simply to swap dollars with the holders of greenbacks, and the greenback takes the place of the coin in the Treasury as current funds, and the law requires it to be again paid out and kept in circulation. This was the second victory for the people in this protracted struggle. By it the greenback has been incorporated permanently into our financial system, and I predict that no power on earth will ever be able to eliminate it. The Supreme Court has finally come to the relief of the people, and by their decision the constitutional status of this currency is forever fixed.

Mr. Speaker, the year 1884 brought about a great change. To use a homely illustration, in November of that year the people took hold of Uncle Sam's wagon, lifted it out of its old ruts and out of the mire, unhitched the old team, hooked on a fresh one, and changed drivers. Now why not move out upon the high lands? Why return to the miserable old ruts from which, with great difficulty, we have been extricated?

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the Forty-ninth Congress, we might just as well face the music first as last. There are four things relating to finance which this Congress must enact in order to relieve the deplorable condition of trade, labor, and commerce, or be prepared to take the consequences in the elections which are to ensue this year.

First. Congress must provide for the unrestricted coinage of American silver into standard silver dollars on private account.

Second. A law must be passed to issue Treasury notes to take the place of bank notes as fast as they are retired. The banks are now retiring their circulation, as is well known, with great rapidity. This vacuum must be filled or business, now sorely languishing, will absolutely perish.

Jackson never said a better thing—and his life was full of good things—than when he said "the banks can not be relied upon to keep the currency uniform in amount."

They are allowed to take out currency upon the plea that they are to furnish the people with a needful circulating medium. They are allowed to retire it for motives of private gain. The people are not present when the directors meet, nor do these boards inquire how their action will affect the public weal. They are public corporations until they procure their franchises, and private corporations ever afterward. This is monstrous.

Third. The larger portion of the surplus now in the Treasury must be paid out in liquidation of interest-bearing public debt now subject to call.

Fourth. We must forbid by law any further discriminations against our silver coin.

Now, I ask if these propositions are not reasonable? They are not fraught with inflation of paper currency, the thing that frightens so many people. The only increase will be an increase of specie if these laws are enacted, and I guess it will be agreed that this will hurt nobody. I predict that a refusal to discharge these plain duties will meet with condign and wrathful retribution from the country. We have had at least eight years of panic and severe business depression within the past thirteen years. The panic that began in 1873 continued until 1879. Then came a temporary revival. The present depression began more than two years ago—yes, three years.

The wealth producers of this land are suffering and sweating drops of blood from every pore. Do not tempt them too far. They contemplate no wrong, but they are organized, they occupy every eminence, and are signaling to each other from every hill-top. They mean something. I beg you take warning in time. They mean to have relief. They have in no way contributed to this condition of things; on the contrary, they are the unoffending victims of the dreadful policy I have been exposing in these remarks.

So far as the conflict is concerned between the powers that be and the people, there is one way out that is strictly honorable for everybody, high and low, no matter what their views may be. Simply enforce this Bland act. It was passed in 1878, in spite of the opposition of the Treasury Department, and over the veto of the Executive. That battle has been fought, and the victory was with the people. Now let everybody stand uncovered before the majesty of the law, and let its mandates be strictly carried out.

The present policy, both as to our metallic and our paper currency, is crushing the very life out of everybody and trampling their energies in the dust. If you were to speak of this country under the similitude of a person, it would be a proper comparison to say that our feet have been cramped and bound like the feet of a Chinese woman while the body has grown to proportions too great to be borne. It is said the Chinese lady of high caste is greatly averse to a robust body because such bodies are out of proportion to their artificially deformed feet. So, now, we also begin to hear the cry, we have too many people, too much competition in labor; the body-politic is getting too large; shut our doors; put out our beacon lights; let this country no longer be an asylum for the oppressed of all nations; say to England that when we accused George III of forbidding the naturalization of foreigners and of obstructing their migration hither we were mistaken and his policy was the correct one. Say to Bartholdi, We do not want your statue of Liberty erected on our shores, facing toward the Old World and holding aloft her torch as a lamp unto the feet and a light unto the pathway of those who are groping their way hither through the darkness. A curse upon such cruel, unnecessary, and un-American theories.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, a theory that declares money redundant when millions of pockets are penniless; that declares a country overpopulated, when hundreds of millions of acres of tillable land have never felt the touch of the plow-share; a theory that accuses labor of the sin of overproduction when millions of laboring people are destitute of every comfort of life, is so monstrous that I do not know how to adequately characterize it. If all the vigor of all the tongues of the earth were concentrated into one single sentence, it would not then be sufficient to properly blast and wither and condemn such a monstrous theory. The nearest I can come to it is to use the old expression, where the vigor of the Greek and the Syriac are said to combine—let it be anathema maranatha!

Sir, instead of closing our doors on the downtrodden of the world, and turning them back into darkness, I would say to the land speculator, to the usurer, to the monopolist, to the untaxed bondholder, to the stock-gamblers, and to the speculators in money, who now have the power conferred upon them by law to make money artificially scarce: to the cattle syndicates in our Western Territories, I would say to all these and to kindred classes, you must cease forever your criminal methods in this Republic. Following the example of the Nazarine, I would cast out the devils and cast them into the sea. Then, when you get rid of these criminal classes, you will find more room for poor people here. There can be no such thing as an overpopulation of bona fide citizens in this country, if you will only give them the safeguard of a humane, economic system.

God has created two hands for every mouth, and two hands, if they are not manacled, can easily feed one mouth and have plenty left for a rainy day. But you can not stop the growth of our population any more than you can stop the flight of time. Within twenty years or less we shall have one hundred millions of people in this country! They are almost here. If I had the power of the old prophet of Israel I would pray God that he might open the eyes of these His servants that they might see that the air is full of chariots and of horsemen. If we will but listen we shall hear the quiet yet majestic march of forty millions of additional human beings who are rushing in upon us like an army to stay forever. What preparation are we making for their reception? In the name of God, what order of statesmanship have we fallen upon? Why, even the lower animals make preparation for the coming of their young, but we stand here with the absolute certainty of this increase staring us in the face, yet we are as dumb as beetles and make no kind of preparation for the stupendous event.

There is not a moment to lose. With all proper humility I wish to address myself to the committees of this House. I wish to say to the Public Lands Committee that I admire the prompt manner in which you are discharging your duties. Guard every acre of the public domain as you would the apple of your eye. Forfeit every land grant where the equities are not clearly with the grantee. To the Committee on Territories I would say, organize our unoccupied territory and let the homeless families of this country have where to lay their heads. Place the remnant of the Indian tribes upon a reasonable area and open the remainder to civilized men, to law, to the church, and to the schoolhouse, instead of to the cattle syndicates and corporations, either foreign or domestic. To the Committee on Banking and Currency I would say bind up this artery that has been severed by the national banks and through which the life of the nation is rapidly ebbing away; stop the bleeding and let the patient recover ere the heart grows still. Let the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures coin up the silver that comes from our mines. God has opened the vault!

The great time-lock which He set in eternity when He was laying the masonry of the mountains has reached the figure upon the dial and the bolt is thrown back. Why be afraid to give the people their own? To the Ways and Means Committee I would utter an earnest and hopeful appeal that a reasonable portion of the enormous surplus now in the Treasury shall be paid out upon the public debt, and that it be thus put in circulation to revive our depressed industries. To the Committee on Commerce I would say, as you love justice and fair dealing give to the people fair rates of transportation, and fair facilities for getting their surplus to market. I submit that these appeals are both reasonable and right.

Why is it that the committees of this House have been powerless so long, and that the House itself has been powerless to discharge its solemn duties? I will tell you why. Every branch of the Government has been for twenty years completely within the grasp of monopoly. Nor have we yet emerged from their dominion, although the people call us to duty by appeals loud, long, and pitiful. When the people ask for an adequate system of finance commensurate with the wonderful energies of the nation, the banking corporations forbid it. When they ask for a postal telegraph, another powerful corporation forbids that. When they ask that the cost of transportation may be cheapened, another hydra-headed being, more terrible than the apocalyptic beast, rises up out of the land instead of out of the sea. When the people want cheap fuel and light, a confederation of monopolists show their teeth. When they ask that their burdens of taxation may be lightened by transferring a portion to the wealthy classes through a graduated income tax, why then those who have been shirking their share of the public burdens rise up and declare with one voice that such taxes are odious. When the whole country cries out for silver, up jumps a triple power, composed of the national banks, gold speculators, and holders of Government bonds, backed by all the aristocracies of Europe, and they cry out with united voice, "Oh, the silver dollar is a dishonest dollar, it is only worth eighty cents!"

Mr. Speaker, there never has been found upon the face of the earth a class of men for whom silver was not good enough except the bondholding and fixed-income classes. Why, Abraham paid tithes to Melchisedek, and Jesus of Nazareth paid his taxes in this very kind of money, but it is not good enough for these modern gentlemen who live upon the taxes wrung from the oppressed people. Such men are not in sympathy with the spirit of our age, nor do they understand the unalterable purpose and courage of the people. The reaction that began in 1876 is now under full sweep and headway. The path of duty stretches out before the Democratic party. It is plain, clear, and unobstructed. Move forward! Be loyal to duty, and if the great State of New York can not stand it, can not keep up with the procession, we will give you Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, and other States in the Northwest.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows, and in miseries.
On such a full sea are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures.

Mr. FINDLAY obtained the floor.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HITT, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. DUNN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HOUK, for to-day and to-morrow, on account of important business.

WAR TAX OF 1861.

Mr. LITTLE. I desire to offer an amendment at the proper time to House bill No. 3. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD for the information of the House.

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to enter a credit as of money advanced to the United States for account to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia for any sum or sums received therefrom, or from lands or land-owners thereof, on any account whatsoever, under said act of August 5, 1861, or any act amendatory thereof, and to pay to the same any balance found due on account, after entering such credit, out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; one-half of such balance to be paid within one year, and the other half within two years, after the passage of this act: Provided, The President may defer either or both such payments for a definite period, and continue so to do if, and as long as, in his judgment, the public interests so require, not, however, beyond five years, and the payment first referred to in this section shall be made at the time of paying the first installment of said balance as aforesaid. The provisions of said act of August 5, and any act amendatory thereof, in so far as they relate to the levy, apportionment, and collection of said war tax, are hereby repealed, and all liabilities and obligations to the United States created thereby or assumed on account thereof are hereby remitted and canceled."

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, to report it with sundry amendments. I ask that a table I now present, which should go in connection with the bill in order to explain it, may be printed with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print the papers will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 78) to extend the time for filing certain claims for compensation for horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill just reported adversely and indefinitely postponed was introduced by me. I ask that the vote by which it was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 599) to refund excessive duties caused by extraordinary overvaluation of the Austrian florin in the year 1878, to report it adversely. As this is not a unanimous report of the committee, perhaps the bill had better, for the purpose of saving the rights of all parties, be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 557) to grant for the use of the public a street across the United States grounds in the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, to ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. From an examination it appears that the military reservation referred to in the bill is not one of the abandoned reservations and has not been turned over to the Department of the Interior for disposal, and therefore is no part of the public lands proper.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (S. 728) authorizing the removal of the statue of Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins from its present location to a site to be selected by the Secretary of War. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that change of reference will be made.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 137) to increase the efficiency of the infantry branch of the Army, reported it with an amendment.

OMAHA NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1120) to authorize the Omaha National Bank of Omaha, Nebr., to increase its capital stock, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. I believe that is the usual course with bills simply authorizing an increase of the capital stock of national banks.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Omaha National Bank, located at Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, is hereby authorized to increase its capital stock, in accordance with existing laws, to any sum not exceeding $2,000,000, notwithstanding the limit heretofore fixed in its original articles of association and determined by the Comptroller of the Currency; and the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to fix the limit of the increase of the capital stock of the Omaha National Bank of Omaha, Nebr., at the amount of $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Omaha National Bank of Omaha, Nebr."

PROPOSED DAILY RECESS.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Rules instruct me to report back the following resolution, submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on the 3d instant, adversely and to move that it be indefinitely postponed:

Ordered, That the Senate will take a recess on each day at 2 o'clock and be in session again at 2.30 p. m. This order may be suspended by a vote of a quorum required in case of adjournment, to be had without debate.

Mr. FRYE. I move its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that it go on the Calendar. I do not think we have got quite up to a full understanding of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Ward be withdrawn from the files, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing the printing of 25,000 extra copies of the President's last annual message for the use of the House.

SITE OF FORT BRADY.

Mr. CONGER. I call up the motion which I entered to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment which he offered to the bill when it was under consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. After an examination of the map, which was not accessible when the bill was before the Senate, I am convinced that my amendment was improvidently agreed to, and I therefore suggest that upon the question being put the amendment be rejected.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 6, after the word "extended," insert the words "and west of Church street extended."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONGER. Now I ask that the bill may proceed to its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTS OF KEY WEST AND TAMPA.

Mr. ALLISON. On Friday of last week I moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West Fla.; and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla. The bill, as reported from the Committee on Commerce, authorized the first and seventh sections of the original transportation act to be applied to the port of Key West, and the seventh section to be applied to the port of Tampa. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] offered an amendment applying all the other sections of the act to both ports, which was agreed to. I moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, because I believed under his amendment the result would be that Tampa, Fla., would be included within the first section of the act as well as the seventh section; but on a further examination of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, comparing notes with him, we both came to the conclusion that as the bill now stands the provisions of the seventh section only would apply to Tampa, Fla.; and with that understanding as to the proper construction of the bill I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection leave will be granted to withdraw the motion to reconsider, and the bill stands passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which comes over under the rule. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas, in reply to a resolution passed by the Senate February 29, 1884, inquiring as to the amount of wheat, corn, rye, and cotton produced and consumed in, imported into, and exported from the different countries with which this country holds commercial intercourse, &c., under date of April 21, 1884, the Secretary of State said:

"Whether the present depressed condition of the wheat trade of Europe is occasioned by the several countries drawing upon their reserve stock for local economic reasons or to affect prices or legislation or public opinion or for some other cause, can not be asserted with certainty, but this important fact remains, that the calculations and estimates herewith submitted prove, as far as statistics can prove under the circumstances, that the stock of wheat on hand in Europe at the close of 1883 did not materially differ from the stock on hand at the close of the previous year; that the wants of Europe are as imperative and as great as they were in 1883, and that the demands upon the United States should naturally be as great, at least, as they were in 1883. How long Europe may or can draw upon her reserve stock or what the exact considerations are which control the several countries in this regard, especially the United Kingdom—which may be said to regulate the wheat markets of the world—time alone can develop.

"The most liberal allowance for the wheat output necessary to the world's consumption shows that the United States should be drawn upon during the present year for 188,000,000 bushels, in round numbers, against 187,000,000 bushels from all other wheat-growing countries. It thus appears that the United States supplies one-half of all the foreign wheat consumed by the several countries, and that instead of being controlled by we should be able to control foreign markets."

And whereas said depression still continues: Therefore,

Resolved, That said Secretary be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the Senate, at his earliest convenience, the amount in bushels of said cereals respectively, and in pounds of cotton produced and consumed, imported into, and exported from each of said countries during the years 1884 and 1885, as compared with like amounts during the three years preceding said dates.

The surplus amount of said products now on hand in foreign countries to meet usual demands until September 1, 1886, the amount likely to be required by importing countries before said date, with the average acreage of wheat now in the ground in foreign countries for the crop of 1886, each in detail.

Also whether later advices confirm the figures and opinions contained in said report, and whether the causes therein referred to, as reprinted in this resolution, or increased production, or diminished consumption of food and clothing by the people, or decrease in population, or lack of money to employ labor and handle property, or, so far as his official information extends, what are the reasons which cause the continued, unprecedented depression in prices for said products in this country and throughout the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Ought it not to read "directed" instead of "requested," under the custom of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "requested" is used in the resolution and not "directed."

Mr. PLUMB. It properly should read "directed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "directed" will be substituted for "requested."

Mr. MORRILL. Does the resolution apply to the Secretary of State or to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. PLUMB. To the Secretary of State.

Mr. MORRILL. It should be directed to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PLUMB. Why may not the Secretary of State gather this information through the ordinary channels which are provided by law for that purpose? The Secretary of the Treasury does not gather such information, I think.

Mr. MORRILL. My impression is that the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury has all this information and that the Secretary of State has it not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I concur with the Senator from Vermont that it ought to go to the Secretary of the Treasury, if it goes anywhere. That Department has all the information. The Secretary of State gathers his information, as I understand, from the reports of consuls and others.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It necessarily must be accompanied with a great deal of labor to that Department to give the information required by the resolution, whereas if it is to go to the Treasury Department, with the statistics there the information may be given without half the trouble it would require on the part of the Secretary of State. I hope, therefore, the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont will meet the approval of the Senator from Kansas. The information is all he wants, and it matters not from what quarter it comes.

Mr. PLUMB. No; the suggestion does not meet with my approval at all. The former resolution was addressed to the Secretary of State. This takes up the inquiry where the former inquiry left off, and has direct relation to it. The former Secretary of State did not make any point about the resolution not having properly come to him, nor did he think he did not have the information at first hand. He has it, or, at all events, if he has it not there, it is through some defect of administration, for the law confers ample power upon him to get it.

Mr. MORGAN. I concur with the Senator from Kansas that this information might be valuable to Congress. At the same time I think we shall be a long time getting it. As suggested by the Senator from Delaware, the Secretary of State has no means of getting information of this kind except through the consular service, and he would have to frame inquiries and send them out to the consuls abroad for the purpose of getting a great part, if not all of it. I believe, however, that there are statistics gathered, I do not know precisely how, in the Treasury Department which probably would answer the whole of the inquiry. That is my impression.

Mr. INGALLS. In what Department is what is commonly called the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. MORGAN. That is in the Treasury Department.

Mr. INGALLS. There is much, I suppose, in that bureau.

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I suppose. I suppose these inquiries could probably be nearly answered in full in that bureau.

Mr. PLUMB. The Secretary of the Treasury has not an agent anywhere off United States soil for the purpose of collecting information of this kind, while the Secretary of State has many hundreds of them, whose duty it is, under the law and under his instructions, to gather just such information. Whatever the Secretary of the Treasury has he has undoubtedly at second hand. He may get it by the reading of periodicals published abroad, by the reports of boards of trade, &c.; but the Secretary of State has under his control agents in every country in the world, whose duty it is to gather from primary sources of information just exactly what we want and what is now, I have no doubt, on deposit in the office of the Secretary of State.

It will be observed by reading this resolution that the resolution to which it refers was introduced by me on the 29th day of February, 1884, and was responded to on the 21st day of April of that same year, not indicating that there was any great necessity on the part of the Secretary of State in the acquisition of this information making any inquiry which was not already answered by the files of his Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLAIMS UNDER FRENCH AND SPANISH TREATIES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement showing the character and amount of each of the claims paid under the treaties with France of April 30, 1803, and of July 4, 1831, and under the treaty with Spain of February 22, 1819, together with the names of the claimants, which statement has lately been furnished by the Treasury Department to the Secretary of State.

Mr. HOAR. A resolution like that was addressed by the Senate some weeks ago to the Secretary of the Treasury. He replied to the resolution in a communication, addressed to you as President of the Senate, that he had prepared that information at great labor and expense, and had sent it to the Department of State, where it was now to be found, and that it would require him to repeat the labor and expense to prepare it again in the Treasury Department, and suggesting that our application should be made to the Secretary of State, which is done by this resolution. I move to rescind the resolution, passed some weeks ago, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish that information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to rescind the resolution previously adopted calling for the same information from the Secretary of the Treasury. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. GETTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will now be stated.

The bill (S. 225) to authorize Col. George W. Getty, United States Army, retired, to be placed upon the retired-list of the Army with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general, was announced as first in order.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who is not now in his seat, wishes to make remarks on that bill, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PUBLIC BUILDING BILLS.

Mr. MAHONE. I ask unanimous consent now that we may take up the bills from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which are on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bills in regard to public buildings, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first case of that kind on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. MAHONE. The first is Order of Business 86, Senate bill 228.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CAMDEN, N. J.

The bill (S. 228) for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J., was considered in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ANNAPOLIS, MD.

The bill (S. 201) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Annapolis, Md., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PARTITION OF LANDS IN LOUISVILLE, KY.

The bill (S. 481) authorizing the partition of certain land in Louisville, Ky., belonging jointly to John Echols and the Government of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Do I understand the name to be John Echols?

Mr. MAHONE. Yes, sir; John Echols.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Of Staunton?

Mr. MAHONE. Not now of Staunton, but formerly of Staunton.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That strikes me more like a deed to property than a bill. I do not think the Senate should pass that as an act of the Congress of the United States. It reads much more like a clerk's office paper, emanating from a county court-house. I just want to call attention to it and not to oppose it. I simply make that observation.

Mr. MAHONE. The Senate at the last session passed this identical bill. The recitation is that to which the attention of the Senator from Virginia has been directed and not to the bill itself.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NORFOLK, VA.

The bill (S. 482) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Norfolk, in the State of Virginia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the site on which the said building shall be erected shall be so selected as to leave an open space around the same of not less than 40 feet in width, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HUNTSVILLE, ALA.

The bill (S. 305) for the erection of a public building at Huntsville, Ala., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys around the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WORCESTER, MASS.

The bill (S. 230) for the erection of public buildings at Worcester, Mass., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 10, after the words "sum of," to strike out "four hundred thousand" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

The plans, specifications, and full estimates of said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SMITH, ARK.

The bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail, in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 16, to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

And for this purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $125,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 1, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the building shall be so situated as to leave an open space around the same of not less than 40 feet in width.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia if he proposes to build a proper jail down there for $25,000.

Mr. MAHONE. What was the statement?

Mr. DAWES. I understood the amendment to be to strike out $50,000 and insert $25,000.

Mr. BERRY. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars for the court-house and post-office. The second section appropriates $50,000 for converting the existing building to the purposes of a jail.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MONROE, LA.

The bill (S. 175) for a public building at Monroe, La., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have no amendment to offer to the bill, but I think at some time any Senator on the floor who is opposed to this omnibus legislation should express his opposition and place himself upon record, and let the responsibility of a river and harbor bill fall where it should, and so of the bills brought here from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

I find to-day on the Calendar twenty-nine bills reported from that committee for public buildings, and in addition to these twenty-nine are those reported this morning. So there are enough of bills in which Senators are interested for their particular States to induce every Senator possibly from the standpoint of a constituent interest to vote for them. I am opposed to them unless they shall come in their regular order, and each one be considered upon its merits.

I leave the question there. That puts me where I want to be. The Senate can pass these bills involving millions of dollars of appropriation of public money, but not by my vote.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

The bill (S. 763) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREENVILLE, S. C.

The bill (S. 549) for a public building at Greenville, S. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OSHKOSH, WIS.

The bill (S. 57) for the erection of a public building at Oshkosh, Wis., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to amend in line 4 of section 1, after the word "purchase," by inserting "by private sale or condemnation;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, by private sale or condemnation, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, internal-revenue office, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Oshkosh, Wis.

Mr. ALLISON. If the land is to be condemned, under what law is it to be done? Have we a general law authorizing the condemnation of property for public buildings, or is it to be under the statutes of the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. SAWYER. I was told at the Treasury Department yesterday that they would have trouble without this clause being put in the bill. They said they could condemn the land under the general law if the words "by private sale or condemnation" were inserted, or they could do it under the State law.

Mr. HOAR. Do I understand my honorable friend to say that where we provide for a public building there is any general law authorizing the condemnation of land without a special authority in the particular case?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that there is; but the Senator from Wisconsin says the Treasury Department informs him that there is such a law. The Judiciary Committee ought to know.

Mr. SAWYER. They can do it through the United States courts under the general law.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be referred to that law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT VICKSBURG, MISS.

The bill (S. 179) to provide a building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office at Vicksburg, Miss., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PORTLAND, OREG.

The bill (S. 86) to provide for the construction of a public building at Portland, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "three," and after the word "hundred" to insert "and fifty;" so as to read:

And plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORTRESS MONROE, VA.

The bill (S. 479) to provide for the erection of a post-office building at Fortress Monroe, Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen," and at the end of the bill to add "and office accommodations for customs officer and United States commissioner;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $15,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of a post-office building at Fortress Monroe, Va., upon the Government reservation. The said building shall be erected upon plans, specifications, and contracts to be approved, in the manner provided by law, by the Secretary of War, and to cover quarters for the postmaster and office accommodations for customs officer and United States commissioner.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

Mr. MAHONE. I now ask to take up Order of Business 92, being Senate bill 453, which we skipped in its regular order.

The bill (S. 453) for the erection of a public building at Jacksonville, Fla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 11, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one," and in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I move, in line 12, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the amount $150,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not now in order. It will be in order at a later stage. The Senate having inserted "one hundred and twenty-five thousand," it is not now in order to change that amount.

Mr. MAHONE. When will that amendment be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At a later stage, when the question comes up in the Senate on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Florida is now in order to the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole by changing the amount to $150,000.

Mr. MAHONE. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PUEBLO, COLO.

Mr. MAHONE. Now let us take up Order of Business 109, Senate bill 1116, which was passed over in its regular order.

The bill (S. 1116) for the erection of a public building at Pueblo, Colo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure a proper site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults, in the city of Pueblo, Colo., for the accommodation of the United States district court, post-office, land office, and other Government offices in said city, at a cost not exceeding $100,000, including cost of site.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. TELLER. I move, in line 9, to insert after the word "hundred" the words "and fifty;" so as to make it—

Not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAHONE. In view of the subsequent information that was brought to the attention of the committee we make no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have some explanation of that increase.

Mr. TELLER. I will simply say that Pueblo is the second city in size in Colorado; it is the place where the United States court is held for an extensive territory, a good deal larger than the State of Ohio. It has a land office, post-office, and a collector's office, of course.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the population?

Mr. TELLER. In Pueblo they probably say 20,000, but it is anywhere from fifteen to twenty thousand people. It is a growing town, and will soon be a very large place. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a small sum of money for a public building in that country.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MONTPELIER, VT.

Mr. MAHONE. Now we come to Order of Business No. 138, Senate bill 1366.

The bill (S. 1366) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Montpelier, Vt., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The bill (S. 1255) to authorize the purchase of a site for a building for a post office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. May I ask the committee whether there is a United States court-house now in San Francisco? We get no information here about these matters. We are simply passing bills, appropriating money, $350,000 at a time, just as this bill provides. Now, is there a United States court-house in San Francisco or is there not? It is certainly proper that we should know the facts before we vote for bills of this sort. Is there no member of the committee who can answer the question? Certainly San Francisco is a small town on the Pacific coast somewhere. It has been there some time. I think it due to the Senate that some member of the committee that reports these bills should tell us why we sit here and vote to appropriate $350,000 to build a court-house if there should happen to be a court-house already in San Francisco that belongs to the United States Government.

I ask now whether there is a United States court-house there? and, if so, then we can inquire further whether that can not be remodeled or improved or whether something else can not be done than the simple appropriation of $350,000 to erect a new building.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, San Francisco is a city now of nearly 300,000 people. It has the promise of being a very large city. The present post-office building is a very insecure, tumble-down affair. The net revenues derived to the Government from that office in San Francisco is somewhere between $400,000 and $500,000 a year. A new building is needed; a new building must be erected for the post-office, for the reason that the present one will probably not stand a great while. Perhaps the first earthquake there will throw it down. In connection with that post-office there ought to be rooms for the courts of the United States. An appropriation of $350,000 is not more than is needed to purchase a suitable location for the post-office and such other public buildings as the Government may require. If there is any city in the United States that needs an appropriation of that amount it is San Francisco. I doubt whether suitable ground can be had for less.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like the Senator to understand that I am not opposing the bill; I am just utilizing the proposition to ask a question.

When we come to think about it, we have taken up this morning how many bills, every one of them involving an appropriation of money. Whose money? Not San Francisco's, not Portsmouth's money, not Boston's, but the money that the people of the United States pay into the public Treasury. We are simply asked to vote blindly for its appropriation to the building of houses called court-houses or something else without any reason given by anybody why we should build such houses. If one of these bills had come in here and had stood upon its own merits involving an appropriation of any amount of money, Senators on this floor, without my intending to impeach them at all, would have inquired into it. If I had introduced a bill here this morning for a public building in any town or city in the State of Virginia involving an appropriation of $100,000 Senators would have inquired into it before they would have voted for it. Yes, sir; if one hundred committees had reported in favor of it they would have inquired into it. Now I find coming in here this morning not one bill but twenty-nine, with an addendum that I presume is to come to-morrow or the next day of half as many more for constructing public buildings in two-thirds of the States of the Union; and that is the only reason that appears on the surface for voting for such propositions or quietly acquiescing in their passage.

I appeal to Senators themselves whether that is not the fact as it appears here this morning. Tell me, if you can, how much money is being appropriated by these bills this morning, and give me one single reason except that the committee has reported in favor of them. I do protest against it; I protest against it as a means of passing bills here to put up public buildings in States without reason assigned for them, and to take the public money and distribute it without regard to where it comes from or the hardship that sometimes it engenders to collect it.

Sir, if you were to take this whole batch of bills and make up the aggregate you have millions of dollars appropriated already, and it is to go on in this silent, acquiescent way. It may suit each and every one who happens to live in a State where a building is to be put up, but it will not suit the people who have to pay for that building and who have no reason assigned for its construction.

If there be a court-house in San Francisco now, why should we not know it before we pay out here one-third or a little more than one-third of a million dollars and throw it in there for the construction of another? If there be a court-house at Portsmouth, or if there be a court-house at any other town or city that we are appropriating for to-day, why should we not know it? But we sit here and pass another river and harbor bill called "public buildings and grounds." I protest against it, and I do ask for some other reason except the fact that a committee has considered twenty-nine bills and brought them in here and reported them in one day and then ask us to vote for them. I know it is said that the money does not go out unless the Appropriations Committee have something to do with the matter; I know it is said that this money does not go out unless the House of Representatives passes these bills. I know that is so, but it is entirely proper for me to enter my protest here, because I belong neither to the House of Representatives nor to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask again of the Committee on Public Buildings deferentially, if they can come down from the high plane of a committee to the ordinary position of United States Senators, to tell us whether there is a court-house in San Francisco, and, if so, what is the necessity of appropriating $350,000 for another.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it happens that I have been in San Francisco and have seen the public building there. I know it is cracked from top to bottom. It is an inferior building, put up many years ago, before the city had reached its present magnitude. There is no doubt in my judgment as to the propriety of putting up a proper building in San Francisco for Government uses.

I wish to say to the Senator from Virginia that we have pretty carefully considered these measures which have been brought before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There is hardly one of them that has not been a subject of long discussion by Senators here representing the different localities; and so far as the State of Virginia is concerned, I think the Senator himself will concede that we have done justice to the State of Virginia, and, having done justice by that State, there are various other States which in comparison ought to receive the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

It has not been the purpose of the committee, so far as I know, to be extravagant. It has in most instances reduced the appropriations that have been asked for; yet it has been considered just and proper in large and prosperous cities of thirty, forty, or fifty thousand people to permit the erection of a post-office building. I think the public judgment of the country will agree that we have not erred. For instance, take such a place as Dayton, Ohio, or Petersburg, Va., or Harrisonburg, Va., or Worcester, Mass. These larger cities, I think, ought to have the attention of the committee, and they have received it, and I think justly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to ask unanimous consent to have just one minute to reply to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will pause until the unfinished business is announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is entitled to the floor on this bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Just one moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BLAIR. For a moment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will not indulge in further debate or provoke it. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that I am not complaining of any injustice done to the State of Virginia in these appropriations. I am simply dissenting from this method of making appropriations.

My esteemed friend will recollect that while we have a court-house at Harrisonburg it had to stand on its own merits, and even on the single objection of the Senator from Iowa, who is the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, it had to go over for one year. It was discussed as a single proposition upon its own merits. I am not prepared now to say that I would not vote for every one of these appropriations; but I do not like to vote for them in this omnibus way. That is my objection. I should like each one to stand on its merits, just as all appropriations as a rule do.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools is now before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Virginia is addressing the Chair.

Mr. MAHONE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not allow the subject before the Senate to be informally passed by and let us proceed with the consideration of the public building bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] requests that unanimous consent be given for proceeding with the consideration of the bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. The education bill now in order will, so far as I am concerned, occupy but very little of the time of the Senate. What I especially wish to accomplish to-day is to have the bill read and to speak probably ten minutes, or at the uttermost not over fifteen minutes, mainly in the way of explanation and the introduction of documentary matter which I deem it important that the Senate should have and which it will take considerable time to print, so that this matter should go to the Public Printer early in the afternoon. I should then myself have no objection, if it is the desire of the Senate on account of these pending measures or any others, that the bill be informally laid aside for, perhaps, the whole afternoon and come up again in the morning with this documentary matter printed and in due form before the Senate. I think perhaps progress will be made on the education bill if a course of that kind is pursued and if I occupy ten minutes in facilitating that course. I should not like to enter into any implied arrangement which would displace the education bill so that it can not be proceeded with at 2 o'clock to-morrow. Perhaps it will suit the Senator just as well to make his motion to lay aside this bill informally ten minutes later and allow me to do what I have indicated now. I shall then make no objection to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. MAHONE. It will not take us more than ten minutes to finish these bills, but if the Senator prefers to go on, be it so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAIR. I think I had better proceed for ten minutes and then I shall make no objection to the Senator's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like either to have the bill read or the consent of the Senate given to its being printed in the RECORD in full.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment, to strike out section 13, in the following words:

SEC. 13. That there shall be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the school-house fund, and which shall be paid out annually to each State and Territory, at the end of the year, until said sum of $2,000,000 shall be exhausted, and no longer, to be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use of pupils attending the common schools in sparsely populated districts where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education in Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this bill as originally introduced at this session and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor was the same in form as the bill passed by the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress with the exception of the thirteenth section proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the committee. It is a section providing a school-house fund of $2,000,000. That section was moved during the discussion in the last Congress in the form of an amendment to the bill by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], but by a close vote it was lost in the Senate. As the bill was introduced at this session that amendment was incorporated as the thirteenth section; but in the consultations of the committee it was deemed better to report back the bill as it had received the sanction of the Senate by a three-fourths vote in the last Congress without alteration, and therefore the committee report it back recommending that the thirteenth section be stricken out, and submit it in that form to the judgment of the Senate.

In this immediate connection I wish to introduce a table which has been prepared showing the population of the whole country, of each State and Territory, except the District of Columbia, and how the whole amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill, $77,000,000, during the next eight years is to be distributed during that period. This table shows the whole amount distributed in that time to each State and Territory that receives anything under the provisions of the bill, and the amount received by the whole country in each State and Territory during each year of the entire period covered by the bill: $7,000,000 to the whole country the first year, $10,000,000 in the second year, $15,000,000 in the third year, $13,000,000, in the fourth year, $11,000,000 in the fifth year, $9,000,000 in the sixth year, $7,000,000 in the seventh year, and $5,000,000 in the eighth, and the amount proposed to be distributed to each State and Territory during each of these years successively under the provisions of the bill. I wish the table to appear as a part of my remarks.

Preliminary computation of amounts to be received by the States and Territories, excluding the District of Columbia, of $77,000,000 distributed on the basis of the number of persons who could not write in 1880, as per Senate bill 194.

[Prepared by the Bureau of Education, January, 1886, at the request of Hon. H. W. BLAIR.]

During the decade from 1870 to 1880 the population of the entire country increased about 31 per cent.—from 38,000,000 in round numbers to 50,000,000 and over. Assuming that the population in this country has continued to increase in the same ratio, and that it will continue so to increase until the next census is taken in 1890, the population of the country would then be 65,704,050. Assuming, too, that from 1880 until the present time the same ratio of increase has prevailed, the population on the 1st of next July would be over 59,000,000 and nearly 60,000,000 of souls. In round numbers, 60,000,000 may be stated as the present population of the United States.

The amount of money raised and expended for purposes of education in the country has, during the last six years, somewhat increased; but from the best statistical information that can be obtained, through the reports of superintendents of education and in other ways, the expenditures for common-school education in the country have not increased in any larger proportion than has the population of the country. If the southern portion of the country were selected as an illustration of this proposition, it would be found that the expenditure, which in 1880 was $12,475,044, had increased in 1882 to $14,325,288, an increase during those two years of $1,850,244. The total expenditure in the year 1884 was $16,655,755, and the increase from 1882 to 1884 was $2,330,467. The total expenditure throughout the United States has increased in just about the same proportion according to the best information that I am able to obtain. I think that the actual expenditure throughout the country for common schools the last year was just about $85,000,000. Of course the great mass of this expenditure is in the Northern States, as in fact the capacity to demand taxation for that purpose is mainly in the North. It is not the fact that the taxation of the latter section of the country is any larger than, and in many localities is not as large for school purposes as, in the Southern States to which allusion was first made; and in this connection I will ask to have inserted as part of my remarks a table showing expenditures each year from 1880 to 1884, inclusive, for the public schools of the Southern States, together with the addenda or memoranda at the bottom of the table:

a For the previous year, no report for this year having been received.
b Thirteen counties not reporting.
c For white schools only; estimating the expenditure for colored schools on the basis of the same per capita expenditure for white and colored children of legal school age, the total expenditure for the year 1882 is $846,623, and for 1883 $825,200.

INCREASE.

If the above total expenditure for 1882 be augmented by the estimated expenditure for colored schools in Kentucky, as explained above, the increase of expenditure for all the public schools in the States named for the year 1882 over that of 1880 is	$1,850,244

I will also introduce now a table showing the amount of money which was paid out to or deposited with the several States, known as the surplus fund, under the act of 1836, which table shows the entire amount to have been $28,104,464.91 deposited with the States of the Union as the Union was then constituted:

This table is pertinent to this discussion because the amounts of money given to several of the States were appropriated to the common schools and became the basis of common-school funds, notably in the State of New York; and in others, I understand, it was expended in the course of time for the benefit of schools.

I desire also in this connection as a part of my remarks to introduce the report of the committee which is very largely matter of statistical calculation, which will be, I think, of great service in the investigation of the subject, and I will also make a part of my remarks on this occasion what I said to the Senate in opening the debate on this bill in the last Congress, which is an aggregation of a large mass of matter gathered from the census, tabulated matter collected from all parts of the country through the Bureau of Education, and many tables prepared by myself or the preparation of which was dictated and directed by myself, and tables prepared by other gentlemen of the Senate and House which illustrate the subject and which when printed will put the Senate in possession of a great mass of statistical knowledge bearing on this subject so far as it is to be found in the archives of the Government or as the result of the researches of individuals.

I desire also in this connection to have the bill printed as it passed the Senate in 1884; and also the bill as introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress. I do this in order that the Senate may have possession of all the information that I seek to present on this subject when it proceeds to a more minute consideration of the bill.

I may in this connection say that the bill as passed by the Senate during the last Congress was the result of a great deal of deliberation and a great deal of concession to conflicting views of Senators from all portions of the country and representing the two great parties of the country. It was the result of three weeks of earnest debate and as it finally passed it commanded the approval of three-fourths of the Senators voting, while of those who were absent a large portion were also in favor of the bill. It is not precisely such a bill as I would myself prefer in all particulars; very likely it is not precisely the bill that any individual in the Senate would prefer should become the law if a law is to be enacted on this subject; but I believe that it would be hardly possible that another month of deliberation would result in the enactment of a bill which on the whole would be more useful to the country or more generally satisfactory to those whose deliberations must be concentrated upon it than the bill as it then passed and as it is now reported to the Senate. Personally I should be very glad indeed to see the amendment which the committee reports rejected and the thirteenth section become a part of the law if the bill is to become a law.

I think it is exceedingly important when school-houses are to be erected in the sparsely settled districts of our country where it is very largely the truth that there is no school-house, that there is no model of a school-house whatever, that under the provisions of that section there should be erected a school-house which should have all the proportions and all the qualities that appertain to a school-house constructed according to the latest scientific, sanitary, and other improvements so that it become a model in accordance with which erection should afterward be made all over that district, finally perhaps all over this country, and thus we should come in the end, and that very soon, to have the whole country supplied with school-houses which should be models of their kind. But, as I said before, the committee thought on the whole it would be better to report to the Senate the bill as it passed, after so long a discussion, after so mature a deliberation by so large a majority during the Forty-eighth Congress.

The report of the Committee on Education and Labor is as follows:

Report to accompany bill S. 194.

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred Senate bill 194, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," have considered the same, and report the same favorably to the Senate, and recommend its passage with the following amendment:

"Strike out the thirteenth section of the bill."

The bill as thus amended is the same as that passed by the Senate during the Forty-eighth Congress, on the 7th day of April, 1884, on a vote of 33 yeas to 11 nays, but which failed to be considered in the House of Representatives.

Since that time the measure has been generally and thoroughly discussed throughout the whole country, and probably public sentiment is more largely in favor of this bill than was ever known to be the case with any other of like importance in the history of American legislation.

The committee believe that under these circumstances it would be useless to consume the time of the Senate with any elaboration of the law and facts involved, and adopt the report of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Forty-eighth Congress, which, although made in support of the bill before it was modified by the slight reduction of the amount of money appropriated by shortening the period of appropriation from ten to eight years, and in some other minor particulars, before its passage, was substantially the same as the bill finally passed by the Senate, and which is herewith reported favorably by your committee with the earnest recommendation that it do pass. It should be observed that early action by the Senate is important, that the measure, if adopted, may be submitted to the House of Representatives seasonably, in order that there may be opportunity for the children of the country to reap the benefits of this proposed legislation during the ensuing year. It is difficult to realize the wrong inflicted by withholding from a child the opportunity for common-school education during a single one of the few years in which he must make his scanty preparation for the battle of life.

The report referred to, and hereby adopted by your committee, is as follows:

[Senate Report 101, part 2, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, submitted the following supplemental report, to accompany bill S. 398:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred Senate bill 398, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," having reported back the same with amendments, recommending its passage, without discussion of the subject, in view of its great importance and the difficulty of collecting statistics and data for the consideration of the Senate, ask leave to make the following supplementary report:

The committee unanimously approve the amount proposed to be appropriated in the bill and its distribution on the basis of illiteracy, and a majority recommend its passage in its present form.

The matter following is largely from a presentation of the subject made by the chairman of the committee on a former occasion, for which, as matter of argument, the committee as a whole is not responsible, but the statistical tables and calculations having been prepared with considerable labor and care, and being substantially unchanged by later information, the same are incorporated with this supplementary report.

We propose to inquire into the nature and extent of the powers and obligations of the National Government to assist in the education of the people when necessary, for its and their own preservation; to develop and illustrate the actual condition of popular education in this country as revealed by the census of 1880, and from other reliable sources, and thereby to demonstrate the necessity of national aid to common schools at the present time; to explain the several measures pending in Congress having that end in view, and to briefly give reasons for supporting Senate bill No. 398, as in our belief best calculated to secure the object desired by the advocates of all.

The United States are conceded by all to be a unit and a sovereignty within the scope of the powers expressly granted or necessarily implied in the written Constitution. The only real question between those who have held to the national idea on the one hand and that of State sovereignty on the other has been as to which had the right to decide upon their relative jurisdictions and to establish their political boundaries when in dispute. Upon this question we do not now propose to enter, because it is not essential to the maintenance of the argument on this occasion. Our leading proposition is that the General Government possesses the power and has imposed upon itself the duty of educating the people of the United States whenever for any cause those people are deficient in that degree of education which is essential to the discharge of their duties as citizens either of the United States or of the several States wherein they chance to reside.

This does not imply that a like power and even more imperative duty do not require the people of every State to educate its own citizens. It is a power not hostile but friendly to the States. Nor is it a power to be exercised unnecessarily. It should be exercised only in extremity, and when manifestly essential to the local, and therefore ultimately to the general, welfare. As the State may not engage in war unless "actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay," so the United States should not enter upon the duty of qualifying the citizen to bear his responsibilities to the nation and to the State until the local power is shown to be inadequate or negligent and the necessity is apparent and imperative. But the power is there.

There is no truth better established or more generally admitted than that the republican form of government can not exist unless the people are competent to govern themselves. The contrary doctrine would be an absurdity, a contradiction of terms. What is the republican form of government but government of the people by the people? But how can the people govern, how exercise sovereignty, except they have the knowledge requisite to that end? Sovereignty requires as much intelligence when exercised by the people as a whole as when exercised by a single individual; it requires more. The monarch governs according to his will, not necessarily with that broad intelligence demanded by the public good. Government for the people by the people implies that degree of popular intelligence which will enable the masses of men to comprehend the principles and to direct the administration of government in such way as to promote the general welfare. Republican government, therefore, requires a higher degree of intelligence on the part of the sovereign than any other form. That sovereign is the whole body of the people. How, then, can the republican form of government exist and continue to exist unless from generation to generation, in perpetual succession, the citizen sovereigns are educated?

But the question is deeper still. How can civilization exist without education? What is civilization but the result of education—of the development and training of the powers of the individual? All human progress and happiness are, in the higher and broader sense, but education, which confers the capacity both to do and to enjoy. If, then, to educate is to civilize, the great duty which society owes to the individual is to educate him, and the benefit thus conferred he is bound to return.

This primary duty of society to its individual membership is by the law of nature imposed, in the first instance, upon the parent. But the parent can not fully discharge it. What then? Society, through the established forms of government, interferes and performs what the parent fails to perform. Is this any violation of the right of the parent? No one pretends it. It is merely the doing of that which, for the good of the child, the parent, and the whole social fabric, must be done. The right of the mass, that is, of the state, is paramount even to that of the individual, inasmuch as the general welfare—the safety of the people—is the supreme law. No parent has the right to say that his child shall remain ignorant. He has no right to breed firebrands and death to the society of which he is a part and to which he owes everything himself. Here is the foundation of the right of compulsory education on the part of the state.

If the parent fully exercised his right to properly educate his child there would be no occasion for the interference of the state; but he fails to do it. Benevolent voluntary effort comes to his aid. This also fails. What then? The law of self-preservation at once asserts itself in behalf of the state as well as of the individual, and for the welfare of both it must put forth its power. These principles are fundamental, and are so plain that their assertion may seem superfluous. But we now come to an important question in the argument.

What in our complex system of government constitutes the "state," the organization in which reside the right and duty to educate the individual when the parent and voluntary agencies fail? The term "state" has various significations, but as used in this connection it is thus defined by Mr. Webster and by the writers upon law: "A political body or body-politic; the body of people united under one government, whatever may be the form of the government."

Mr. Bouvier says:

"In its most enlarged sense it signifies a self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights and to do right and justice to foreigners. In this sense the state means the whole people united into one body-politic, and the state and the people of the state are equivalent expressions."

There can be no doubt that under our system the word "State" includes the combined powers of both the United States and of the several States of whose union the former is composed. The territory which constitutes the one includes the many. The citizens of the many are individually and identically the citizens of the nation at large. Every citizen of the United States who resides in a State is a citizen thereof. "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." The rights and powers of the great community of fifty millions of people who constitute the citizens of the United States and of the several States are vested in the Government of the United States, in the governments of the several States, or in the people themselves. Although these three depositories of rights and powers are "distinct like the billows," yet they are "one like the sea." Distinct in their several jurisdictions, yet they constitute one great whole, and act together harmoniously for the individual and common good, each independent of the other in its sphere, like the independent yet concurring powers of nature in the realms of physical life, where—

> All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
> Whose body nature is, and God the soul.

It is only as we use the word "state" in this complete sense that the people of the United States, who are also the people of the several States and of the Territories, constitute "a body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights, and to do right and justice to foreigners."

Now, the right of self-defense, which is the right of self-preservation, is the right to live and to be. The right of the people to be at all implies and includes the right to constitute and maintain the state—that is to say, government—and to prescribe its form, for human existence is impossible without government. The governing power must know how to govern or it can not govern. Can a man do that which he knows not how to do? The people have distributed the functions of government between the national and the sectional or the State authorities, and have retained in themselves the initial exercise of all power through the ballot. The ballot is the republican form of government both in the nation and in the State.

Intelligence is necessary in the individual, who is the sovereign in the one as well as the other. The right and duty of the national portion of the Government to preserve itself, and of the individual to preserve it and to exert his sovereignty through its forms perpetually, are absolute. It is the right and duty of the whole to preserve the whole, and the right and duty of the whole to preserve the whole implies the preservation of all the parts by that whole, to the existence of which all the parts are necessary. It is not necessary that a man should have written permission to live. He needs no license stamped or sealed to give him the right to breathe.

His creation implied all that. Just so the people, when they created governments both of State and nation, republican in form, and bade them multiply their blessings and replenish the earth with their civilizing and ennobling activities, necessarily gave them the breath of life and the inherent power to preserve that life. To have written into the constitutions of the States or of the National Government the right of self-preservation would have been as superfluous as to have required a written order for the sun to shine, for water to run down hill, or for any created thing to obey the law of its being. But the right to educate the child throughout the nation is the right to preserve the Government and the nation. That right can not be curtailed. It is geographically coextensive with the jurisdiction of the Government itself, and self-preservation compels its exercise by the National Government whenever there is failure for any reason on the part of the parent and the State.

OBLIGATION TO GUARANTEE GOVERNMENTS REPUBLICAN IN FORM.

Still again. The whole people of the United States, that is to say, the nation, by the primary act of the masses and by the act of their State governments, have commanded in the written terms of the constitutional law of the land that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." How is that obligation to be fulfilled? Must its performance await revolution, and must destruction precede preservation? Is it a guarantee of possession to stand by while war and tempest obliterate, and then endeavor to restore? Is reconstruction the only or is it the better way in which the obligation to guarantee a government republican in form to the States of this Union can be discharged? Is not the ounce of prevention still worth the pound of cure? Does not the duty to guarantee imply the right to prevent and to preserve even more strongly than to restore? Prevention might be possible when restoration would prove to be impossible.

It is a conceded proposition that where a duty is imposed all the power necessary to its performance is conferred, and the choice of means, so far as there is no prohibition, goes with the power.

If all this be so, what doubt can there be, not only of the power but also of the absolute duty of the National Government, to perform its obligation of guarantee in the only effective way in which it is possible? When does the obligation to guarantee attach? Did it not commence with the adoption of the Constitution, and is it not continuous in its operation? Does it not attach as a right in the Territories, which are inchoate States? Does it not follow every movement of the concurrent life of the nation and of the States, and enter into all their constitutional and inseparable relations?

Not to educate is to destroy. It follows inevitably that not to educate is to break the guarantee of republican government to the States. If the parent and the State fail to educate the citizen, does not this clause of the Constitution compel the nation to educate its child?

THE GENERAL WELFARE.

But Congress has express power "to provide for the general welfare of the United States," and to exert its utmost power of taxation to promote that which was one of the six greatest ends enumerated in the preamble, and to secure which the Constitution itself was ordained and established by the whole people of the United States of America. That people well understood that without intelligence it would be impossible "to preserve the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." It goes without argument to say that in no way can the general welfare be so promoted as by the general diffusion of knowledge and the discipline of the mental powers of the masses of the people, which can only be accomplished by common schools maintained by governmental power.

Governments are but agencies established by society to secure the happiness of its individual members. Whenever they cease to promote the end for which they were created they should be destroyed, and whenever and so far as they fail they should modify or reverse their action.

If in the past the National Government has not borne its due proportion of the burdens of the education of the people, or if new conditions have arisen which require of it a degree of co-operation with the several States not hitherto necessary in securing to all citizens of the Republic that degree of intelligence which is indispensable to the safety of society and to the happiness of the individual, who is at once the subject and the sovereign in both local and national administration, then the time has come for a new departure, and the withes of straw must yield to the expanding limbs of the giant who is arousing himself for the labors of the time which has already come.

But it must not be forgotten that the fathers and mothers of this Republic never conceived of the possibility of its existence except as its foundations should be laid upon knowledge and virtue, and that the promotion of sound learning was deemed to be the fundamental duty of the national power. The time would fail to speak of the founders of the colonies, and of the constant efforts which they put forth from New Hampshire to Georgia to establish schools and colleges for the education of those who were to enjoy the rights of citizenship within their respective borders. The Revolution was the outgrowth of the school, the college, and of the free worship of God. The constitution of every State as well as the Declaration of Independence and the whole theory of the national polity depend upon the possession of knowledge and virtue by the people at large.

Hence Washington never ceased by word and deed to enforce this great truth upon his countrymen. Adams and Franklin and Jefferson and Madison and Hamilton and Clinton and Rush, and the whole galaxy of the immortals who cradled the nation, dwelt continually and emphatically upon the primary necessity of the universal intelligence of the masses to the perpetuation of their freedom and happiness. Nor did they confine their efforts to precept alone. The Congress of the Confederation, as well as the General Government under which we now live, at an early day proclaimed their duty and exercised their power to apply the property of the nation to promote this great interest of all. One-sixteenth part of the public lands was devoted to the education of the children of the coming States from the foundation of the Government; three-score years afterward the amount was doubled, and from time to time during the century nearly which has elapsed since the ordinances of 1785 and 1787 the nation has contributed of its resources to the establishment and maintenance of the public schools.

The messages of Washington and other early Presidents, who, with their associates, created and defined the national powers, and the responses of both branches of Congress, are full of the recognition of the obligation of the General Government to encourage and foster universal education, and as he passed from the scene of official life the Father of his Country solemnly adjured the American people "to promote as an object of primary importance institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge."

The promotion of learning and science, and the appropriation of the public money for that purpose, has always been recognized as within the scope of national power. Measures for the establishment of a national university have been supported by our leading statesmen, and appropriations of public money and other property have been from time to time made to establish or assist institutions like the agricultural colleges, observatories, the Smithsonian Institute, and exploring expeditions by land or sea, all which implies the possession of the undoubted power as well as the disposition to apply the resources of the National Government to these high purposes whenever in its judgment the general welfare will be conserved thereby. But even if all this were untrue, the case would remain the same.

Laws are silent in war. They were silent in the conflict through which we have just passed. But what is meant by this? Not that all laws are silent; but that minor regulations which appertain to more quiet times are suspended in the overmastering presence of the great first law of self-preservation.

In this sense, which is the true sense, laws may become silent in peace as well as in war. We are now in peace, but if there be laws which forbid the education of the illiterate millions of the American people by the outstretched arm and bursting Treasury and innumerable intellectual and moral agencies of the nation at large, then those laws should, and in presence of the uprising sentiment of the people I may say they shall, be silent in this land until by the diffusion of knowledge, and of the power which knowledge gives to every child within our borders, peace may be made perpetual. Universal intelligence never makes war. Only ignorance is convertible into brute force. Ignorance is slavery. But for ignorance there would have been no slave. But for ignorance among the nominally free there would have been no rebellion. The contest we now wage is with that still unconquered ignorance of both white man and black man in all parts of the country which hurried us by remorseless fate to fields of death four long years. Besides this, we confront the demands of hordes incoming from beyond both great oceans, and of the advancing generations of men.

Whenever the State or the local community is able to sufficiently instruct its youth it should do so, and the national aid should be invoked only when made necessary by local neglect or inability. But this burden is primarily one of taxation. Civilization must be paid for. Education is the insurance upon civilization. It must be kept up everywhere, for the risk is everywhere. To leave the child of the pauper uneducated is to incur as great risk of destruction by the fires or floods of ignorance and crime as if he were the scion of wealth and place. So, too, in the nicely balanced forces and relations of localities, the neglect of a county or a township may in some vital emergency destroy the institutions of the whole country by remote or even by immediate results. Hence there must be no admission of the doctrine that the general power can yield the right to educate when necessary to the general good. This power is indispensable to preserve the parts as well as the whole.

If these principles are true, we are next brought logically to the consideration of the actual condition of the United States and the Territories thereof in respect to the education of the people. This must be done that we may determine intelligently the question whether the nation should appropriate and, either directly or through State agencies, apply the public money for that use.

A GLANCE AT OUR RELATIONS TO OTHER NATIONS AS BEARING UPON EDUCATION.

In determining our duty in reference to the promotion of the general welfare by the appropriation of the public money to the education of youth, it may be well for us to consider not merely our internal relations, but also our position among the nations and our responsibilities to mankind at large. We will do this before proceeding to minute internal inquiries. It is no less than high crime for us to ignore the fact that we are but the trustees of our institutions and political principles for the human race. We can not innocently forget that there are fifteen hundred millions of our fellow-men living upon the planet to-day, of whom not more than one-sixth part are even nominally civilized, and not more than one human being in ten is free, or leads a life which to a citizen of our own favored country seems to be worth living at all. Yet the prospects of the world as a whole were never so hopeful as now.

What imagination can realize the horrors of history, and who can believe that the balance of human experience during the transition from the savage state to the blessings of civilization and of liberty is on the side of happiness? Until the development of our own institutions, it can not be said that the masses of men who made up the population of any nation since the dawn of time were free. Liberty has either been wholly unknown, or she has been current only in aristocracies, which, while maintaining something like toleration and equality among themselves, have been more despotic in their rule of the masses below them than any king or czar. But our nation, and ours alone, has been advanced to the condition of a sovereignty universally diffused, to that of kingship popularized. This alone is freedom.

We have gained all that we possess by reason of the education of the individual, and we hold it upon the same tenure. What we hold for ourselves we hold for mankind, and we hold it for both upon the same condition by which it was gained, and that is the continued and universal education and development of the people. As the leader of the nations it is indispensable to the discharge of our high trust that we incessantly perfect and carefully preserve ourselves. This work can not be delegated; this responsibility can not be surrendered nor evaded. Our relations and our influence with mankind at large are sustained and felt in our national, and not in our State or individual, capacity. Our position as a nation can only be maintained by a culture and development of the citizens of the Republic which shall be stimulated by the national idea, controlled by it, if need be, and, at all hazards, by it guaranteed and made sure.

The responsibilities which rest upon us, placed as we are in the forefront of the struggle of the ages, with the bannered hopes of the race in one hand and the sword of liberty, by whose sharp edge alone they can be realized, in the other, are not to be sneered at; as they were unsought, so are they not to be evaded, and as God liveth they shall be discharged. The common schools of this country are the recruiting ground and the disciplinary camp of the great armies of civilization and freedom and progress, whose victories have been and shall continue to be still more renowned than those of war.

Lycurgus resolved all legislation into the proper education of youth. To so shape the laws and institutions of a country as to perfect the citizen is to make the restraint of statutes unnecessary. Teach the individual man the full extent and just limitation of his own rights, imbue him with a desire to perform his duties to others and to the state, cultivate within his breast the love of country and intelligent recognition of the Deity who creates, controls, and blesses all, and society would go alone. This should be the great end of the law-giver. Educate the rising generation mentally, morally, physically, just as it should be done, and this nation and this world would reach the millennium within one hundred years. But such education is now impossible.

Who is to instruct? The teachers are but as children yet, and although the fields are white unto the harvest the laborers are few. Nothing is so important as the education of the youth, but one dollar is expended for that use where ten are imperatively required; and it is still a debated question whether the nation shall be taxed to save its own child, when in no other way can itself be saved. It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but no pause can be permitted in effort without deterioration, and the increasing millions constantly cry more, more, give, give, and the cry must be heeded, or even the low standard of to-day will sink to a still lower and more dangerous level.

But as we look abroad we behold the human race astir. We are no longer the exclusive custodians of the elements of progress; we are even now in sharp competition with European nations for rank as an intelligent people.

The emigration which comes over the Atlantic is not the same grade of human beings who came one-fourth of a century ago. Ireland is being educated; so is the whole population of the British Isles, and, save Russia and Turkey, this is true of the Continent.

We are not much longer to compete industrially with the sodden brain and clumsy finger of an unlettered peasantry; but with two hundred millions of producers, whose quickened powers of mind and body, combined with lower wages, will compel our relative advancement in order to maintain our superiority, or drive us to the increase of our already onerous tariffs in order to maintain our own industries and give employment and bread to our own people.

When we look abroad to the harvests of the commercial world we find ourselves already, save in the realm of sentiment, of no more consequence than any fourth-rate grower. While Asia, Africa, and the islands of the sea are stretching out their hands for civilized interchange, and are developing markets which within fifty years will double the consumption of all articles which the skill of advanced civilization pours into the lap of barbarism and of increasing culture en route to the enlightened state, we have small part in the matter now, and prospectively none at all, unless we arouse ourselves to the absolute necessity of the culture of our present and fast-increasing population throughout our continental domain. We have no ships, and our flag is a tradition on the sea; it is as rare in the marts of mankind as the pelican of the wilderness in Broadway, New York.

Great Britain learned the secret of power from the defeat which gave us independence one century ago. Since then she has not lost a province; she has annexed the world. How? Instructed in policy by our success she has established her colonies on every vacant lot of the globe; she has tied her cables to the commerce of every clime, and her strong fleets of peaceful convoyed by her warlike marine are steaming for the coffers of London with the wealth of all nations, and especially of those among whom are to be found the profitable markets of future times.

Wherever among these upheaving populations she sends her ships she carries her institutions and her laws. Her colonies remain, and she has learned so to foster and govern that now they never rebel, but develop into powerful allies, and her morning drum-beat, "which encircles the globe," stirs the tides of patriotic devotion in the heart of every listener; and so it is that she can now precipitate millions of armed men upon any hostile power, whether she calls them from the dusky but valiant millions of Hindostan, from the hardy recruits who face us all along our northern line, or from Australia and the islands of the sea. Great Britain is located everywhere. She has learned that if she cultivates the individual citizen and rules in harmony with the impulses of the human soul empire will be without end—except in the end of the world.

Hence, her statesmen, after forty years of study, enacted the laws of 1870, which mark as absolute and a far more important landmark in the policy of that power as the free-trade policy of 1848. Great Britain is aiming to compel the education of every child covered by the jurisdiction of her flag at home or abroad, and to provide, or lead her colonies to provide, the means to fully carry out that policy. Within twenty-five years, unless we advance, we shall be far behind the English-speaking race in any other part of the earth.

What does this mean for us? Not merely humiliation and half-masting of our banners. That we have already learned how to do and to rest quietly under it. But it will hurt our pockets. It will make us relatively poor. Wherever there is more intelligence there will be greater skill, and we shall become another Brazil to preserve the balance of stupidity on the western hemisphere. What is true of the new policy of Great Britain and of its consequences to us is also true of most other European nations. We would emphasize this aspect of the subject of education. Its importance to us can not be overestimated. To mankind at large it means the millennium.

Let us examine the data of European progress, that we may see if these things are so, for those who compare themselves among themselves are not wise.

In this examination it is pertinent to observe, not so much the actual condition of the people of other countries, as to note whether they are losing or accelerating their pace. Five years will educate a generation substantially, and it will not be long ere the Latin and the Saxon of Europe will reach and pass his kindred on this side the Atlantic if a relative improvement shall not be here maintained.

The data submitted below has been prepared at our request by the Commissioner of Education, whose invaluable labors have contributed so much to the elucidation of the great subject committed to his care.

"NATIONAL AID TO EDUCATION.

"1. FRANCE.

"The population of France is 36,905,788. The liberality of the Government of the French Republic in providing for the education of the masses is without precedent in its history. At the close of the Franco-Prussian war, in 1871, popular education was in a backward state. According to the census of 1872 the total population was 36,102,921. Of this number 13,324,801, or 36.9 per cent. (including 3,540,101 children under six years of age), were unable to read or write; 3,772,603, or 10.5 per cent., could read only; and 19,005,517, or 52.6 per cent., could read and write.

"This lamentable condition of affairs was due to optional attendance at school, and to the neglect on the part of the government to provide ample accommodation for a school population of nearly 6,000,000.

Many communes were too poor and some were unwilling to establish new schools or enlarge the existing ones. After some delay a law was passed March 28, 1882, making education obligatory for all children between the ages of six and thirteen; and authorizing poor communes to apply for government aid whenever their means are not sufficient to establish and maintain public schools. The government, however, does not always wait for departments or communes to apply for aid; it invites them to apply, and assures them of hearty co-operation. Letters were sent on the 3d of April, 1882, by the minister of public instruction to the prefects of the departments of Morbihan and Vendée (on the western coast of France), on the condition of education in these two very backward districts.

"In Morbihan 60 per cent. of the conscripts for the army, and the same proportion of persons who present themselves at the mairies (city halls) for marriages, can not read or write. A number of communes have already voted sums amounting to 500,000 francs for the purpose of increasing the number of schools, and the minister of public instruction now offers them a further subsidy of 1,000,000 francs for the same purpose.

"In Vendée, owing to similar causes, there also prevails a lamentable state of ignorance. Here 40 per cent. of the conscripts can not read or write. In order to attend school hundreds of children would have to walk daily from 8 to 10 miles. The minister offers the department a subsidy of 600,000 francs for the purpose of increasing the number of schools.

"Government aid to primary education.—In 1860 the government aid to primary education amounted to 5,424,036 francs; in 1870 (under the empire), 9,817,513 francs; in 1877 (under the republic), 22,035,760 francs. In 1882 the government aid will be about 50,000,000 francs, in order to enable all the communes to enforce the obligatory school law. In addition to the above amount the departments spend this year 25,000,000 francs and the communes 60,000,000 francs for primary education. During the two weeks from April 15 to April 30, 1882, the Guvernment has spent 1,244,835 francs for new school-houses. The total amount spent by the government alone in 1881-'82 for all phases of instruction amounts to 114,353,941 francs, or $22,717,880.

"2. BELGIUM.

"The following table shows the government grants to education from 1831 to 1882:

	Francs.
1831	217,000
1843	466,000
1845	711,000
1852	1,230,000
1857	1,689,000
1864	3,707,000
1870	6,425,000
1878	11,500,000
1882	20,400,000

"The population of Belgium is 5,403,006.

"In 1830, when Belgium separated from Holland, there were only 1,146 public primary schools. In 1875 there were 4,152 public primary schools and 2,615 adult schools. In 1847, 41.06 per cent. of the conscripts were illiterate; in 1850, 35.35 per cent., and in 1878 only 19.59 per cent.

"3. ITALY.

"Italy has a population of 28,209,620, and a school population (6-12) of 4,527,582. Of this number 2,057,977 attend school, against 1,604,978 in 1870. The number of public elementary schools has risen from 32,782 in 1870 to 41,108 in 1879. The annual grant to these schools in 1882 is 31,000,000 lire ($6,200,000). The 7,422 private elementary schools receive no state aid. In 1873 the government grant was 15,000,000 lire ($3,000,000); in 1876, 20,000,000 lire ($4,000,000), and in 1878, 24,000,000 lire ($4,800,000). This shows an increase of 16,000,000 lire, or $3,200,000, since 1873.

"The above grants are made in addition to large buildings and gardens given for educational purposes in nearly every city and town of the kingdom.

"According to the census of 1861, out of a population of 21,777,334, there were 16,999,701 who could neither read nor write—7,889,238 males and 9,110,463 females.

"In 1871 out of a population of 26,801,154, there were 19,533,792 who could neither read nor write.

"The present minister of public instruction has taken energetic steps to provide accommodations for all the children of school age, and to enforce the law which makes attendance at school obligatory for all children between the ages of six and twelve.

"4. ENGLAND.

"The annual parliamentary grants to elementary schools in England and Wales was: In 1840, £30,000; in 1850, £180,110; in 1858, £668,873; in 1862, £774,743; in 1863, £721,386; in 1866, £649,006; in 1867, £682,201; in 1868, £680,429; in 1869, £840,711; in 1870, £914,721; in 1873, £1,313,078; in 1875, £1,566,271; in 1877, £2,127,739; in 1879, £2,733,464; in 1882, £2,749,863.

"The number of schools has risen from 10,751 in 1872 to 17,614 in 1880; the number of seats from 2,397,745 in 1872 to 4,240,758 in 1880; and the average number of children in attendance from 1,445,326 in 1872 to 2,750,916 in 1880.

"The population of England and Wales is 25,968,286.

"5. SCOTLAND.

"Population, 3,734,370. The parliamentary grant to elementary schools amounts to £468,512 for 1882-'83. The number of elementary schools has increased from 1,962 in 1872 to 3,056 in 1880, the number of seats from 267,412 in 1872 to 602,054 in 1880, and the number of children in average attendance from 206,000 in 1872 to 404,618 in 1880.

"6. IRELAND.

"Population, 5,159,839. Number of elementary schools, 7,522. Number of pupils, 1,031,995. The parliamentary grants for popular education in Ireland amounted to a total of $2,948,669 in the ten years, 1860-'69; in 1868 it was £360,195; in 1872, £430,390; and in 1882-'83 it amounts to £729,868.

"7. PRUSSIA.

"Population, 27,251,067. The government expenditure for education amounts to $11,458,856 in 1882 against $10,000,000 in 1881. As nearly all the Prussian schools derive income from endowments, the government grants are chiefly devoted to the establishment of new schools and the improvement of old ones.

"8. RUSSIA.

"Russia, with a population of 78,500,000 and a school population of 15,000,000, has only 28,357 elementary schools and 1,213,325 pupils. The annual government grant to all grades of schools amounts to $9,000,000. Of this amount only $475,000 is devoted to elementary education. The finances of Russia exhibit large annual deficits, caused partly by an enormous expenditure for war, and partly by the construction of railways. According to official returns, the total war outlay incurred by Russia during the four years 1876-'79 amounted to $728,984,635.

"The mass of the population of Russia is as yet without education. In 1860 only two out of every hundred recruits levied for the army were able to read and write, but the proportion had largely increased in 1870, when eleven out of every one hundred were found to be possessed of these elements of knowledge.

"10. AUSTRIA.

"Education until recently was in a backward state in Austria, the bulk of the agricultural population, constituting two-thirds of the empire, being almost entirely illiterate. During the last twelve years, however, the government has made vigorous efforts to bring about an improvement by founding new schools at the expense of the state wherever the conveniences were too poor. A law was passed in 1868 making education obligatory for all children between the ages of six and fourteen.

The government expenditure for public education has increased from $2,300,000 in 1870 to $6,500,000 in 1881."

In this connection, as illustrating the educational impulse moving the whole British Empire, we annex the following data of schools in the Province of Ontario:

"The population of Ontario is 1,913,460 and the school population 489,924. In 1844 there were in the province 2,505 schools, with 96,756 pupils; in 1875, 5,056 schools, with 494,065 pupils; and in 1880, 5,245 schools, with 496,855 pupils. The total expenses for education were $275,000 in 1844, $2,297,694 in 1881, $3,258,125 in 1873, $3,433,210 in 1878, and $3,414,267 in 1880."

It will be observed that in every instance cited the nation assumes the duty and exercises the power not only of assisting but of controlling the subdivisions which make up the whole and provides for compulsory attendance of the child. The principle is fully recognized that when the general welfare demands, individuals and subdivisions must submit, if necessary for any cause, to receive compulsory blessings, coupled with which is the duty which implies the right of the whole to provide for the protection and safety of all the parts by the utmost exercise of its powers. True, their governments are not so complex as ours, but the principle is still the same. Self-preservation dictates this policy everywhere.

It is impossible to dwell upon this branch of the subject or to spread before the Senate the evidence, coming from almost every Christian and from some pagan people, like the Japanese, for instance, that the human race is arousing itself to the realization of its innate possibilities. The most astounding and humiliating fact of which we have knowledge, bearing upon the relative educational status of our own compared with the people of Europe, is this, that to-day only 14 per cent. of the immigration which comes from that continent to our shores is illiterate, being substantially of the same grade of intelligence as our general population. In other words, immigration no longer adds essentially to American illiteracy. It is probable that within a few years teachers from abroad will compete with our own for the higher wages paid to instructors in our common schools.

ACTUAL STATE OF EDUCATION IN THIS COUNTRY.

We now call attention to the actual condition of the American people as revealed by the most authentic evidence. Fortunately the returns of the census of 1880 are so fully compiled that through the labors of the Bureau of Census and of the Commissioner of Education the most important data has been tabulated, and we are enabled to give the country the cold steel of reliable statistics. These are more eloquent than any other possible statement, and demand the profoundest study of every citizen of the land.

But this should be remembered: It by no means follows that the person who can read and write is therefore qualified to discharge his duty as a sovereign. The line of lowest qualification has been fixed as by common consent in the preparation of official data at that level, but the suffrage itself is universal to males in nearly every State.

We recognize the right to govern himself as a part of the inalienable heritage of every man regardless of literary attainments. But the capacity to read and to write is so obviously necessary to the proper exercise of this inherent right that, as a rule, we instinctively demand of every citizen that he shall possess himself of this power and we demand of society that the opportunity to do so shall be provided at the public charge. True, that the history of the human race has been largely wrought by unlettered men, and there be many educated fools, while many a philosopher and natural leader can not read.

But we would remind those who judge hopefully of our condition because a majority of our people can read and write, that of those who have the power a large proportion possess it very imperfectly, and almost never exercise it. Of those who can write, multitudes do not place a sentence on paper twice in a lifetime. Thousands never get an idea from the printed page. The qualification is but nominal, and suffices merely to accomplish the ordinary business of life under the careful supervision of others, and is not really the source of knowledge and means of interchange of thought. So that the figures of every census are far more favorable than the facts as to the real mental condition of the people. This consideration should never be lost sight of in the study of the problem before us, which is, How shall we qualify every citizen to best perform his part? How shall the whole people be lifted to the high level where subjects are unknown, and where equality and sovereignty are convertible terms?

The population of the United States in 1860 was thirty-one and one-half millions. In 1870, thirty-eight and one-half millions; in 1880, 50,000,000. In 1890 it will be at least 70,000,000. It is to-day nearly 52,000,000. So it must be remembered all the while that even the tremendous numbers and alarming conditions revealed in the following returns are constantly expanding in their gigantic proportions and overwhelming gravity.

CONDITION OF THE SUFFRAGE.

Table No. 1 we take from the speech of Senator BUTLER, lately delivered in this Chamber during the Forty-seventh Congress. It is from the last census returns. It is the rule to estimate one voter for every five persons in the community, which makes the voting population of the country 10,000,000 in 1880. The total number over twenty-one years of age who can not write is 4,204,363, of whom 2,056,463 are whites and 2,147,900 are colored, including about 300,000 Indians and 100,000 Asiatics. Assuming one-half of these to be females, and therefore to have no souls, and not only to be without but to be unfit to exercise the suffrage, and making allowance for the unnaturalized citizens, there will remain 2,000,000 of illiterate voters, about equally divided between the white and colored races. One voter in five can not write his name. He casts a ballot whose contents are to him unknown except from hearsay. He can not tell the Constitution of his country from the code of Draco. He is the prey of the demagogue or the victim of prejudice, but he holds the balance of power in almost every State and in the nation at large.

Follow down these columns so pregnant with the demonstration of danger and dishonor to the Republic.

The illiterate voters of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, in short of every Middle, Southern, and most of the Western States, have power, if combined, to decide any political issue that is now, or for years is likely to be, pending between political parties. They represent ten of our fifty millions of people.

The concentration of wealth, population, and power in cities makes the condition of education therein an element of great importance in forming a correct opinion upon the whole subject, and should be considered by itself. We therefore furnish the needed data in the following table:

TABLE No. 3.—Table prepared at the request of Hon. H. W. Blair, by the Bureau of Education, showing the total population, school population, enrollment, average attendance, total number of teachers, length of school year in days, number of pupils or children of school age not attending school, per cent. of school population enrolled in schools, per cent. of school population not enrolled in school, in eighty-eight cities (census of 1880).

*More than the school population. This is due to the fact that they are allowed to attend school after the school age established by law.

Average attendance about two-thirds of enrollment or one-third of population of school age. Thirty-four cities 50 per cent. and upward not enrolled at all.

As Tables Nos. 2 and 3 contain an affirmative statement of the agencies at work in the production of intelligence among the people, and to a certain extent of their results, I have endeavored in Table No. 4 to exhibit in one view the combined mass of ignorance mathematically stated, upon which no impression has been made; a mass of illiteracy dense and thus far impenetrable to the first ray of morning.

The above table, prepared at the request of Hon. H. W. Blair, chairman of the Senate Committee on Education, is respectfully submitted to the Superintendent of the Census, with the statement that while its figures are believed to be in most instances correct, they are entirely preliminary, and therefore subject to such changes as may result from the final revision.

HENRY RANDALL WAITE,
Special Agent Statistics of Education, Illiteracy, Libraries, Museums, and Religious Organizations.

The preceding table was prepared in the month of June, 1882. We use it now because of its greater convenience for comparison in some respects than the later tables in the Compendium of the Census.

Table No. 5, with some repetition of matter in previous tables, contains other data which are important and convenient for reference.

We draw a few deductions from these tables, but can not analyze them fully. They challenge profound and prolonged examination.

The total population of the country by the census of 1880 is 50,155,783. Table No. 2 shows a school population of 15,303,535, of whom 9,780,773 are enrolled in the public schools, 567,160 in private schools, with an average attendance in the public schools of 5,804,993. The average attendance in private schools is not known.

The column giving the different school ages in different States and Territories upon which the return of school population is based indicates that the whole number of the children who are of suitable age to receive instruction is much more than 15,303,535. In Texas, for instance, the school period is from eight to fourteen years, and her total is only 230,527, while her population is 1,591,749. In Tennessee, where the school period is from six to twenty-one, a much preferable rule, and the whole population is 1,542,359, the school population 545,862, or two and one-third times that of Texas, although there can be no doubt that families are quite as large in the latter as in the former State. Besides this, and taking into account the increase since the census from natural causes and from immigration, we believe it to be a low estimate which places the whole school population of the country at 18,000,000.

While we know of no reason to believe that the number of pupils who actually receive instruction has been essentially increased, expenditure certainly has not been increased to any great extent, while in some States since 1870 it has fallen off. We are, then, now charged with the education of eighteen millions children and youth who in less than ten years will be the nation. Of these ten and one-half millions are enrolled in public and private schools, and six millions is the average attendance, while seven and one-half millions, or five-twelfths of the whole are growing up in absolute ignorance of the English alphabet. This seems incredible, but these are the figures. They ought not to lie, for we have paid for accuracy and completeness. At this rate before another census we shall have passed the line, and there will be more children in this country at any given time within the school ages out of the schools than in them, and before half a century ignorance and its consequences will be likely to have overthrown the Republic. We have reached the crisis of our fate. The education of the people is the most important issue before the country, and it must remain so for years to come.

Table No. 3 depicts and demonstrates a special source of danger of controlling importance.

These eighty-six cities contain 8,300,081 inhabitants, or nearly one-sixth of the total population of the country. As a rule the school facilities are better in cities than in rural portions of the country, and these great centers of influence are supposed to more immediately influence the course of affairs. And as we are constantly pointing pathetically at the unfortunate South, so we of the all-wise, all-perfect, all-conquering North may well study the condition of our cities, which are as great a source of danger as the ignorant rural population of the South.

These cities contain an aggregate school population of 2,052,923, of whom 1,302,776, or three-fifths, are enrolled; that is, are more or less instructed during the school year, while only 858,532, or two-fifths, fully avail themselves of the advantages provided, and more than one-third never enter the school-room at all. Some of these may attend private schools, but not a large proportion, for the whole number of pupils in private schools of the 15,303,535 in the country is only 567,160.

The average attendance is about two-thirds of the enrollment, or one-third of the whole number who should attend.

In thirty-four of these cities from 50 to 82 per cent. of the children are not enrolled at all; that is, they will never know how to read or write.

New York has a school population of 385,000, of whom 270,000 are enrolled, 114,000 are not enrolled at all, and the average attendance is but 132,000.

The average attendance in Cincinnati is 27,000, less than one-third the whole number, while 51,000 are not enrolled at all. It does not relieve this dark picture to say that these must be in private schools, for out of the school population of the entire State, numbering 1,043,320, only 28,650 are in private schools. Of these, probably not more than 10,000 can be found in Cincinnati. Yet Cincinnati is one of the best of our great cities, and Ohio is a model State.

Chicago enrolls less than half—43 per cent.—of her children in the public schools; less than one-third are habitually in school.

Saint Louis has a school population of 106,000; 55,000 are enrolled; 36,000 is the average attendance.

Milwaukee has 38,000 children of school age; the average attendance is 11,000; 20,000, or 55 per cent., are not even enrolled.

Wilmington, N. C., has an enrollment of 866, or 18 per cent., while 82 per cent. of the children of that city would appear to be habitually absent from school.

New Orleans has a school population of 57,000. The average attendance is 15,000, while 39,000 is the average absence. The whole State of Louisiana has but 4,404 pupils in private schools.

But it is useless to specify these deadly instances. The cities of our country have been our pride. Behold the record. The revelations of the census ought to overwhelm us with shame and stimulate every power of the national intellect and command every dollar in the Treasury or within reach of the taxing power to provide a remedy equal to the terrible disease.

Table No. 4 exhibits in one mass the illiteracy of the United States. Five millions of our people over ten years of age can not read; six and one-fourth millions can not write. In eighteen States, including two territories, more than 13 per cent., and in eleven more than 25 per cent. can not write. In fifteen States and Territories more than 11 per cent. of the white population over ten years of age can not write, varying in these from 11 to 45 per cent. Illiteracy among the colored population varies from 13 to 70 per cent. The percentages of illiteracy among the whites vary in different subdivisions from less than 2 per cent. in Wyoming, where it is the least, to over 45 per cent. in New Mexico, where it is largest. An inspection of this table not only demonstrates the great necessity everywhere, but that necessity is most pressing where its ability to meet its requirements is least, making assistance from a central power indispensable.

The nation is a whole. As such it must act; as such it is to be saved or lost. In this battle for its life the whole line must be maintained and advanced. Reenforcements must be sent to the weakest parts. Because they are the weakest is the reason that help is wanted. If they were strong, no re-enforcements would be needed. Nor does it change the duty and necessity even if there be forces unless they fight. They must still be aroused to duty, for the work must be done. The evil is the same whether the battle be lost for one cause or for another. But in this struggle we believe there is as great danger to the future of the country from the Northern cities as from the Southern States.

In both help is imperatively needed, and it must be given where it is most needed and that immediately. The only reasonable test is, for the present at least, that of illiteracy and not of population. As a permanent rule, after conditions are once equalized, the latter will be the more just. But once thoroughly educated it is to be hoped that the several States will take care of themselves. To deny them aid in the present emergency is as though a general should march his reserves to the support of his unassailed positions, leaving his already broken lines to take care of themselves. Such a commander would find it difficult to excuse himself by saying that the articles of war required every soldier to do his duty or every division and corps to defeat the enemy. It is as a whole that battles are lost or won and that nations are lost or saved.

It may be conceded that every State and Territory should educate its children so far as it has the power, but when that fails, upon the same principle that individual citizens pay taxes for the common good according to their ability to pay, and not their personal needs for protection, or the number of their children or dependents, must the whole people see to the provision of whatever funds are required for general education where otherwise taxation to any locality would become unduly oppressive.

ABILITY OF THE SEVERAL STATES TO BEAR TAXATION.

Table No. 6 exhibits the population and valuation of the States and Territories, with their totals in 1860, 1870, and 1880, also the per cent. of increase or decrease of valuation as between 1860 and 1880. The preparation of this table was for the purpose of comparing the capacity of different portions of the country to bear the burdens of taxation immediately before the war and at the present time.

* Per cents preceded by the minus sign indicate a decrease. † In Pennsylvania occupations are also valued for assessment. This valuation for 1880 was §6,659,580. ‡ Virginia and West Virginia are taken together, as West Virginia belonged to Virginia in 1860. § Average for the United States.

In this connection it is proper to observe that in the rebel States, where slavery existed in 1860, the valuation then aggregated $2,289,029,642, of which $842,927,400 was in slaves, and proper allowance must be made for this fact in estimating present power to bear taxation. The negroes were then taxed; they were productive as property. Now they require to be educated; then education would have destroyed them as property. They are now doing little more as a totality than to support themselves. Their taxable property is thus far very slight. It has been stated as a matter of pride on this floor that in Georgia colored people are taxed for $6,000,000 of property. The assessed valuation of Georgia is by the last census $239,472,559. What, then, must be the general poverty of the colored people of Georgia, even when of her total population, which is 1,542,180, 725,274 have accumulated $6,000,000, or $8 each, of taxable property. And if these things be so in Georgia, what must be the destitution of the colored race elsewhere throughout the South, and how idle to talk of their educating themselves.

During these twenty years population has increased in every State and Territory. With the exception of New Hampshire, where the increase is 6, and Vermont, where it is 5, and in Maine, where the increase is 3 per cent., nowhere has it been less than 31 per cent., and as a rule it has been enormous. The South has more than held her own with the older States, and the negro, despite everything, has raised his numbers to almost 7,000,000. They are a permanent factor in the destiny of America. They are here to stay.

While the population of the whole country has increased 60 per cent. the valuation has risen but 40 per cent. In Alabama the valuation is 72 per cent. less than in 1860, while the population is 31 per cent. greater. In Arkansas population nearly doubled, while sources of taxation have fallen off more than one-half. The same is true of Florida. In Mississippi population has increased nearly one-half and wealth has decreased more than three-fourths, and generally throughout the South the same tendency is apparent.

As explained above, the negro is not now a tax-paying element to the extent he was before the war. He lived there and was a source of profit to his master. Now he lives and multiplies, but both he and his master seem to be growing thus far poor together.

We speak now of the general fact, and believe that this state of things is but temporary. It will, however, become permanent unless the proper remedy of increased intelligence and well-directed industry is applied. And to this end the means must come largely from without, for they do not exist within these States. In Kentucky and Delaware the negro child is educated only from the taxation of his own race. As a rule he can have no school at all unless from charity. Table No. 6 indicates that on the whole national resources of taxation are not keeping pace in development with our population, and demonstrates the absolute helplessness of many States alone to deal with their illiteracy.

THE SOUTH.

The Southern States, seventeen in number, including the District of Columbia, are usually classed together as a section of the country requiring special help. Of all but Maryland, Missouri, and the District of Columbia this is true. The following table exhibits their condition:

a In Delaware the colored public schools have been supported by the school-tax collected from colored citizens only; recently, however, they have received an appropriation of $2,400 from the State; in Kentucky the school-tax collected from colored citizens is the only State appropriation for the support of colored schools; in Maryland there is a biennial appropriation by the Legislature; in the District of Columbia one-third of the school money is set apart for the colored public schools, and in the other States mentioned above the school moneys are divided in proportion to the school population without regard to race. b Several counties failed to make race distinctions. c Estimated. d In 1879. e For whites the school age is six to twenty, for colored six to sixteen. f Census of 1870. g In 1877. h These numbers include some duplicates; the actual population is 230,527.

Excluding the States of Maryland and Missouri and the District of Columbia, and the total yearly expenditure for both races is only $7,339,932, while in the whole country the annual expenditure is, from taxation, $70,341,435, and from school funds $6,580,632, or a total of $76,922,067 (see Tables 2 and 7), or one-tenth of the whole, while they contain one-fifth of the school population. The causes which have produced this state of things in the Southern States are far less important than the facts themselves as they now exist. To find a remedy and to apply it is the only duty which devolves upon us. Without universal education, not only will the late war prove to be a failure, but the abolition of slavery be proved to be a tremendous disaster, if not a crime.

The country was held together by the strong and bloody embrace of war, but that which the nation might and did do to retain the integrity of its territory and of its laws by the expenditure of brute force will all be lost if for the subjection of seven millions of men by the statutes of the States is to be substituted the thralldom of ignorance and the tyranny of an irresponsible suffrage. Secession and a confederacy founded upon slavery as its chief corner-stone would be better than the future of the Southern States—better for both races, too—if the nation is to permit one-third, and that the fairest portion, of its domain to become the spawning ground of ignorance, vice, anarchy, and of every crime. The nation, as such, abolished slavery as a legal institution; but ignorance is slavery, and no matter what is written in your constitutions and your laws slavery will continue until intelligence, hand-maid of liberty, shall have illuminated the whole land with the light of her smile.

Before the war the Southern States were aristocracies, highly educated, and disciplined in the science of politics. Hence, they preserved order and flourished at home, while they imposed their will upon the nation at large. Now all is changed. The suffrage is universal, and that means universal ruin unless the capacity to use it intelligently is created by universal education. Until the republican constitutions, framed in accordance with the Congressional reconstruction which supplanted the governments initiated by President Johnson, common school systems, like universal suffrage, were unknown. Hence, in a special manner, the nation is responsible for the existence and support of those systems as well as for the order of things which made them necessary. That remarkable progress has been made under their influence is true, and that the common school is fast becoming as dear to the masses of the people at the South as elsewhere is also evident.

The nation, through the Freedmen's Bureau, and perhaps to a limited extent in other ways, has expended $5,000,000 for the education of negroes and refugees in the earlier days of reconstruction, while religious charities have founded many special schools which have thus far cost some ten millions more. The Peabody fund has distilled the dews of heaven all over the South; but heavy rains are needed; without them every green thing must wither away.

This work belongs to the nation. It is a part of the war. We have the Southern people as patriotic allies now. We are one; so shall we be forever. But both North and South have a fiercer and more doubtful fight with the forces of ignorance than they waged with each other during the bloody years which chastened the opening life of this generation.

MEASURES PROPOSED.

We think it is clear that the nation has the power, which implies the duty of its exercise when necessary, to educate the children who are to become its citizens; and that the urgent demand for its aid at the present time has been demonstrated. We desire to offer a few suggestions in regard to the methods which are, in our judgment, proper to be pursued by the General Government in the present emergency.

Your Committee upon Education and Labor has reported this bill making provision for temporary aid to the common schools of the country, and this we consider more immediately important.

There is another measure which has been pending for several years, proposing the creation of a perpetual fund, to be composed of the accretions to the Treasury from annual sales of public lands, railroad revenues, and other sources, the interest of which shall be distributed to the States, at first upon the basis of illiteracy, afterward according to population; one-third to be appropriated to the support of the agricultural colleges, and the remainder of such interest to the common schools. This sum would be small at first, but would rapidly increase, and such a fund would in time become a mighty agency for good, a perpetual fountain of blessing, and a bond of union so long as the country shall endure. The conception is sublime, and every effort should be made to secure the enactment of this measure into law during the present session; certainly during this Congress.

It is proposed to surrender the management of the income from this fund to the States, subject to forfeiture of subsequent installments in case of abuse or maladministration. The provisions of this bill have been the subject of much careful study by wise men for many years, and it is not probable that any substantial improvement can be suggested to this bill providing a perpetual fund; certainly not until the light of experience shall have been turned upon its practical operation, when further legislation can be had if necessary. We believe it to be wise to pass the bill as it is, and at once. Favorable action will soon be taken on this bill by your committee.

TEMPORARY AID.

But for immediate use more money must be provided. Temporarily, many millions from the national Treasury are imperatively demanded by every consideration of the national honor and of the public welfare. A generation is educated in the common schools (if at all) every five years. If the next two generations of children could be educated properly, the country would then be in the hands of intelligence instead of ignorance, and no community once enlightened will ever permit itself afterward to retrograde. Intelligent self-interest will support the schools in self-defense, and, once elevated to the proper standard, every locality will maintain itself without much, if any, extraneous aid being required. Besides, if we could bridge the chasm of the next ten years, the proposed fund to be accumulated from the public lands and other sources would have become important, and would furnish all the assistance which might thereafter be demanded in addition to local taxation.

Whatever is done by the nation now should be directed where it will do the most good. Illiteracy is the disease, and the remedy must be given accordingly. Until the standard of knowledge is brought up to a reasonable level every where, implying capacity to discharge the duties of sovereignty and citizenship, the nation must, or at least should, in common prudence, distribute its money upon the basis of comparative ignorance.

The safety of each State, however intelligent, is as much endangered by the ignorance of any other as is the illiterate State herself. Such is the complication and interdependence of our political and even of our industrial affairs that all great national issues and questions of policy are really decided by the small majorities which are liable to be found in any State. The interests of Massachusetts, so far as they are affected by national relations, are as likely to be decided by the vote of South Carolina or California as by her own. She has no interest, then, save that the money taken from the Treasury in support of education should go where there is the greatest need of schools. Thus the reason for distribution according to either wealth or population fails.

As to the amount which is necessary, great diversity of opinion prevails among those who desire the extension of aid by the Government. The bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] proposes to set apart of the tax upon intoxicating liquors about fifty millions of dollars yearly. He proposes to distribute to the States according to population. The House committee has reported a bill appropriating ten millions, diminishing one million yearly for ten years next ensuing, to be distributed to the States according to illiteracy.

The bill or report appropriates fifteen millions of dollars the first year, fourteen millions the second year, and afterward a sum diminishing one million yearly, until there shall have been ten annual distributions, the last of which would be six millions—it being thought probable that State systems could by that time maintain themselves, or that from the perpetual-fund bill, should that fortunately become a law, all the aid necessary could thereafter be derived. We believe that to give a larger sum would induce the people of the States where most of it would be expended to depend too largely upon the national Treasury for the support of their schools, and the result would be waste and inefficiency.

The community must pay to the extent of its ability, or it will lose interest in its schools, and its children will not be properly educated, no matter how much money may be received, the burden of raising which the people do not feel. Besides, it will be difficult for those portions of the country which are comparatively unused to the practical administration of school systems at once economically and profitably to absorb the full amount which is really needed, and which will be required as greater accommodations, competent teachers in sufficient numbers, and larger attendance of pupils are secured. The proportion of $15,000,000 which this bill would give to the Southern States would prolong their existing schools for at least three months with present accommodations and teachers, and in addition would secure the extension of the school system to such districts and children as are now absolutely without the pale of any educational privileges whatever. We believe no less sum can possibly do this.

The following table exhibits the distribution of $15,000,000 as proposed in this measure:

The bill contemplates the gradual increase of ability and disposition to support their own schools, as the natural consequence of greater intelligence in all cases, so that the appropriation and its necessity will pass away together.

In the bill reported by your committee provision is made for the disposition of the share of those States which may not desire its general distribution, when, by reason of the efficiency of their schools, national aid is not required; for the establishment of schools where none now exist, until every child in the country has his fair chance in the race of life, so far as a common-school education can give it; for the more efficient training of youth in the Territories, in some of which the condition is most deplorable, involving direct and most serious responsibility of the National Government, which is bound to properly care for these future States, comprising one-third of our entire domain.

These features will require more minute examination in future discussions.

Whatever form of administration of the funds it shall be deemed wisest to adopt, the appropriation should be immediately made. If it passes this session we shall have lost a year. To have lost a day was deemed a calamity by one of the noblest of men. Who can measure the wrong of one lost year, of one full year of further delay, to grapple with the wide-wasting and increasing evils of ignorance among our whole people? It would be better to appropriate injudiciously rather than not at all.

The vast sums expended for 300,000 Indians, for rivers and harbors, for improvement of the banks of the Mississippi River, for an Army which ignorance chiefly makes necessary, for a Navy which is safe only in the docks, the millions paid for pensions annually, paid because there was a lack of common schools in our country such as this bill seeks to build up, and the general profuseness of expenditure which applies to the management of our affairs, are a sufficient exposure of the hollow pretense that we can not spare a few millions yearly to rescue our institutions from the imminent peril which threatens them.

Taxation rests almost wholly upon our luxuries and our vices. Yet it is proposed to give them still further license by reducing taxes while we are ruined for the want of schools. We consume every year seven hundred millions of alcoholic beverages. The interest on the money paid in one year for alcohol and tobacco by the American people, if judiciously invested, would relieve them from all taxation for the support of common schools hereafter at present rate of expenditure. We are liberal in self-indulgence. We are economical in self-denial, even for our good. But parsimony to the schools is death to the Republic.

We may postpone the remedy, but the evil will increase. The issue can not be evaded. Common-school education must become universal or the form of our Government must be changed. We believe that the next few years will decide the question.

National aid to schools is indispensable to the national existence; national aid to common schools should be given liberally, given now, and applied where most needed.

This done, the Republic will be perpetual.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY W. BLAIR,

Tuesday, March 18, 1884,

On the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this is, in my judgment, among the most important public measures which have been considered by the Senate since the close of the war. It is, in fact, the logical consequence and true conclusion of the war. Had common schools been universal throughout the country there would have been no civil war; for intelligence among the masses of the people would have abolished the causes which led to it, and the chains of the bondsmen would have dissolved like the mists of the morning in its warmth and light, instead of awaiting to be broken by the terrible hammer of Thor. Knowledge and virtue are the indispensable conditions of free government, and virtue without intelligence is of no avail, for while virtue is the natural if not universal fruit of knowledge, yet good intentions without knowledge are by a profound philosophy pronounced to be the very pavement of hell. So the restoration of the Union and the reconstruction of States with governments republican in form will be found to be but a bitter delusion unless the people throughout the whole country shall be made and kept sufficiently intelligent to know and to maintain their rights generation after generation.

As the National Government is republican in form, so its own existence depends upon the same conditions as the existence of the States; consequently in self-defense and in self-perpetuation it must secure directly by its own act or indirectly through other agencies the intelligence of its citizens, who are themselves the Government.

Beyond this, one of the most important constitutional functions of the General Government is its obligation to guarantee a republican form to the States.

If the General Government commits suicide by neglecting the education of the people, how can it fulfill its constitutional guarantee? And how can that guarantee of government republican in form be made and kept good to the people of a State who are too ignorant to be capable of self-government.

Self-existence and the discharge of its constitutional obligations compel the National Government to educate the people, who are the common citizens of both the nation and the State, whenever the local community fails to discharge this primary duty of a free people.

Mindful of the time of the Senate, and having in the last Congress discussed this subject at some length, and having embodied somewhat of that discussion in the report of the committee on this bill, I shall confine myself on this occasion, unless the course of the debate shall hereafter render it necessary to do otherwise, to a statement of the facts in the existing situation of the country, which, in my opinion, require the appropriation of large sums of money by the nation to the temporary aid of common schools throughout the country, and to the explanation of the provisions of this bill, which undertakes to provide a suitable remedy for the alarming and increasing ignorance existing among the people at the present time.

First, then, of the evil.

The bill proposes to give temporary aid to common schools in all the States and Territories.

Common schools are the means everywhere adopted to educate the masses of the people, and the instruction and discipline obtained in them constitute all the preparatory school training which twenty-four twenty-fifths of the American people receive for the practical duties of public and private life. I say public life with no reference to the incumbency of political office. By the public life of an American citizen I refer to his life as a sovereign; to his constant participation in the active government of his country; to the continual study and decision of political issues which devolve upon him whatever may be his occupation; and to his responsibility for the conduct of national and State affairs as the primary law-making, law-construing, and law-executing power, no matter whether or not he is personally engaged in the public service as policeman or President, as any State official whatever, member of Congress, Chief-Justice of the United States, or a humble justice of the peace. In republics official stations are servitudes. The citizen is king.

But, since knowledge is power, it is obvious that the degree of education which the citizen must acquire is commensurate with the character and dignity of the station which he occupies by the theory of the government of which he is a part. By so much and so far as he is deficient he will fail, and either become a nonentity or a source of danger and misrule. The indispensable standard of education for the people of a republic, then, is far above the mere capacity to read and to write the language in common use in a limited or perfunctory way. The education obtained in the common school and imparted, if necessary, with compulsion by the State should be such as to enable the citizen sovereign to obtain and interchange ideas and knowledge of affairs as well as to transact intelligently and safely all matters of business in the avocations of life. Measured by this not too exacting standard, the degree of disqualification for the duties and opportunities of citizenship actually existing is far greater than is indicated by the common standard, which is considered to be the nominal capacity to read and write. This test is the one resorted to in taking the census as a test to measure the inteligence of the people; and its use for this purpose by the Government and its adoption as the condition of the exercise of the suffrage by some States have served to fix in the public mind a very low standard of education compared with that which should be set up in the common school. I am heartily in favor of universal suffrage, for a partially ignorant people, with a free ballot actually secured to them, will govern themselves better than they will be governed by kings and aristocracies.

But I desire to remind the American people that the more they know the greater will be their personal power and the better they will govern themselves.

If the American people suffer from innumerable and bitter ills which they can never remove until they know how it may be done, their first great step is so far to educate themselves as to obtain the knowledge from which will result the power to remove the evils of their civil, social, and industrial condition. It is therefore at once apparent that tabulated statements, such as we obtain from the census and like statistical processes fall far short of completeness as indications of the actual educational condition of the people. It is certain that the school facilities which have hitherto existed have been wofully insufficient, since more than one-ninth of the adult citizens of the country are unable even to read and write. What unknown margin of ignorance lies above this indication and yet below the true standard of competency and educational qualification for the duties of citizenship we are left without definite means of judging, but we know that it is very great. This dark belt of indefinite width which, like an unsurveyed desert, lies beyond the well-defined boundaries of ignorance and incompetency should be constantly borne in mind as we proceed with the consideration of the subject.

During the decade from 1870 to 1880 the population of the United States increased from thirty-eight to fifty millions. A like percentage of increase since 1880, a period of four years, would give a present population of about 56,000,000 of people.

By the census of 1880 there were in the United States 36,761,607 persons 10 years of age and upward.

In round numbers now there are 41,000,000. In 1880 there were, over 10 years of age, who could not read, 4,923,451 persons, or 13.4 persons in a hundred, and now there are 5,500,000. In 1880 there were 6,239,958 persons over 10 years of age who could not write, or 17 persons in a hundred. Now there are 7,000,000 who can not write.

In 1880 there were 32,160,400 white persons in the United States, of whom 3,019,080, or 9.4 per cent., could not write. Now there are 3,500,000 white persons in this country who can not write.

In 1880 there were, of colored persons in the United States, 4,601,207 10 years old and upward, of whom 3,220,878, or 70 persons of every hundred, could not write. Now there are 3,600,000 colored persons in the United States over 10 years of age who can not write.

In 1880 there were white persons, over 21 years of age, 21,984,202; persons of whom 2,056,463, or 9.4 of every hundred, could not write. Now there are 2,313,521 white persons in the United States who can not write.

In 1880 there were 11,343,005 white males over 21, of whom 886,659, or 7.8 per cent., could not write. Now there are 1,000,000 white adults who can not write.

In 1880 there were 2,937,235 colored persons in the United States over 21 years of age, of whom 2,147,900 could not write, or 73.1 per cent. of every one hundred. There are now probably, 3,500,000, as the colored population increases by births 7 per cent. faster than does the white from births and immigration.

In 1880 there were colored males over 20 years of age, 1,487,344, of whom 1,022,151 could not write, or 68.7 per cent. Now there are 1,150,000 or more, all voters.

In 1880 there were white and colored male persons over 21 years of age, 12,830,349; of whom could not write 1,908,810. Now there are males over 21, 14,500,000, of whom 2,150,000 can not write. These include the voting population. Unnaturalized persons over 21 should be deducted. The average of immigration is now, however, as intelligent as our own population. That is a thought not familiar to our national contemplation. One voter in seven can not write. The percentage of illiteracy is something less among males than among the other sex, or there would be one voter in five unable to write. Of those who can write a large number can only, with great painstaking, contrive even to write their names. It is greatly to be doubted whether more than three-fourths of the voting population is capable of reading or writing with such facility as to make those arts a source of intelligent suffrage.

Nearly three-fourths of the illiterate voters of the country are in the sixteen Southern States. The same States contain about one-third the entire population. Iowa has 18,886 voters who can not write in a population of of 1,624,615. Georgia has 169,505 voters who can not write, and a total population of 1,542,180—nearly ninefold illiterate suffrage in about the same population. In proportion to population, notwithstanding the great cities within her borders, New York has only one voter who can not write to five in South Carolina.

I take the following from the very able report made in the last Congress by the House Committee on Education and Labor:

The last census shows that there are 6,239,958 people of this country above the age of 10 years who can not write—12.44 per cent., or about one-eighth of our entire population. The census further shows that 4,715,395, or 75.56 per cent. of them, are in the recent slave States, which contain but 36.8 per cent. of the population of the country. In six of those States one-third or more of the population above the age of 10 years are illiterate, while in the Territory of New Mexico nearly one-half can not write. Of the white population of the country only 6.96 per cent. can not write, while 47.7 per cent. of the colored population are in that condition. More than one-fourth of the entire population of those States is illiterate.*

The committee call attention to the illiteracy of the voters in the late slaveholding States. The following table has been furnished the committee by the Superintendent of the Census. It shows the total number of persons of 21 years of age and upward, and also the number of that age and upward who are illiterate. [Table, see next page.]

The following statement, showing the ratio of illiterate males of 21 years of age and upward to the whole number of males of the same ages in the States named, is derived by the committee from the preceding table. There being but few foreigners in those States, nearly all of those persons are citizens of the United States and voters:

Ratio of illiterate males 21 years of age and upward.

Alabama	46.7
Arkansas	30.4
Delaware	17.6
Florida	38.6
Georgia	45.1
Kentucky	26.0
Louisiana	47.4
Maryland	19.4
Mississippi	46.7
North Carolina	42.3
South Carolina	51.9
Tennessee	31.9
Virginia	33.3
West Virginia	16.4
Missouri	11.0
Texas	24.3

The average ratio of illiterate males of the ages named in the above States is 32.3.

*The ability to write is considered by statisticians the true test of illiteracy, as many persons through shame will not admit they cannot read, but are not so likely to claim that they can write. Besides, a person who can read and not write is essentially an illiterate.

Of the above illiterates 69.7 per cent. are colored, and 30.3 per cent. are whites.

In ten of the above-named States more than 30 per cent. of the voters are illiterate.

In six of them the illiterates are about 50 per cent.

In South Carolina 52 per cent. are illiterate.

The State of Alabama has 120,858 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 151,507.

The State of Georgia has 145,087 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 155,651.

The State of Mississippi has 111,541 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 117,078.

The State of Louisiana has 102,932 illiterate voters. Its popular vote in 1880 was 97,201.

While it is true that in many of the States not one-half of those entitled to vote actually did so, yet the wonderful nearness of the number of illiterates to the number of those who exercised the right of suffrage is startling.

The truism that no government which rests upon universal suffrage can long continue unless the suffragists are intelligent, in the light of the above facts presses itself upon our attention with renewed force. The words of James Madison, uttered in 1825, are a present warning: "A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy, or both." Nearly half a million of the white and almost a million of the colored voters in the South can not read the ballots which they cast. But thirteen years have elapsed since the latter class was given the ballot. At that time all of them were grossly ignorant not only of letters, but also absolutely devoid of all knowledge of the rights and obligations of citizenship. During the last ten years the number of illiterates in the country has increased about 400,000, though the percentage of illiteracy to the whole population has decreased nearly 2 per cent. It would, however, take forty years to dispel this illiteracy at this rate of diminution.

There are 145,000 illiterate voters in North Carolina, and 117,000 in South Carolina. I clip the following from the National Republican of last winter:

The percentage of illiteracy to the voting population of the Garfield States in 1880 was less than 6; in the Hancock States it was 29.

About five times greater.

It is true that about 69 per cent. of the illiterate voters in the old slave States are Republicans, and it is also true that nearly that per centum of the illiterate vote was suppressed.

Suppressed, it is true; but it could not have been if intelligent.

Alabama has 120,858 illiterate voters; the popular vote of that State in 1880 was 151,507. Georgia has 145,087 illiterate voters; the popular vote there that year was 155,651. Mississippi has 111,541 illiterate voters; her popular vote in 1880 was 117,078. Louisiana has 102,938 illiterate voters, and cast 97,201 votes.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire knows that the great body of the illiterate men in Alabama voted for Garfield, and not for Hancock.

Mr. BLAIR. I stated that. The Senator will find as I go on that my remarks are not prepared with any idea or feeling of self-glorification for the section of country that I belong to. I have endeavored to simply state the facts.

By the Census (table 40) Compendium, page 560, it appears that the total number of white males over 21 years of age in the country in 1880 was 11,343,005; native-born, 8,270,518; foreign-born, 3,072,487; colored, including Japanese, Chinese, and Indians, 1,487,344; making a total of 12,830,349.

The question of the suppression of the Republican vote in the South is one that I did not propose to introduce into the debate, and it is one on which there is something perhaps to be said on both sides, if it were before us.

In 1880 there were 105,465 Chinese, 148 Japanese, and 66,407 civilized Indians. I am aware of no means by which the actual number of voters in the United States can be ascertained, but if we add to the total of male population over 21 years of age one-eighth of the total of 1880 we have 1,603,793, and in all at this time 14,434,142. Assuming one-half the foreign-born males of voting age to be naturalized, we have a voting element as follows, making allowance for increase of one-eighth in each element since the census was taken: Native-born white voters, 9,303,332; foreign-born white voters, 1,728,274; colored (excluding Chinese, Japanese, and Indians), 1,479,739; total voting population of the United States in 1884, 12,411,345; or in round numbers there will be 12,500,000 men whose ballots will or may decide the next Presidential election.

The percentage of illiterate white males over 21 years of age by the census of 1880 is 7.8, and of colored the rate is 68.7. There is no perceptible change in this percentage for the better, judging from the fact that the illiterate population increased, according to a statement of the Commissioner of Education, between the years 1870 and 1880, 581,814 persons. There is some confusion in the data, but I think there was an increase during that period substantially as estimated by the Commissioner. We have then at the present time an illiterate white voting population of 852,665; illiterate colored voters, 1,016,580; total illiterate voters, 1,869,245.

Generally the number is placed at more than 2,000,000. Such estimates can never be more than approximately correct, but they are in my belief practically greatly understated, because the technical qualification of being able to write one's name, however crudely, is very slight evidence of capacity to comprehend political issues or to discrimate intelligently between candidates for public positions.

This observation derives special significance when it is still further considered that the enumeration must of necessity rely generally as to the possession of even this qualification upon the verbal statement of the party concerned, who is not likely to make an unpleasant admission of incapacity against himself.

I do not believe that more than two-thirds, or at the most three-fourths, of the voting population of this country is to-day in possession of a degree of proficiency in the arts of reading and writing that qualifies them, through the use of those arts, to exercise the right of suffrage more intelligently than do total illiterates. The school education of great multitudes is nominal, not real.

I purposely omit other data as to the distribution of the illiterate vote. If it were uniformly dispersed it would be less dangerous. But concentrated as it is in masses at points along the line, while intelligence can never be too strong anywhere, and considering that a majority of one in Florida or in Oregon may decide the most important of national elections and determine the future history of the whole country, I for one find it impossible to sleep in peace over this volcano.

As will be seen by reference to tables in the report of the committee and to the census the school age varies greatly in different States. In some it is from 5 to 15, in others from 4 to 21, and with great diversity between those extremes. In a speech in support of a measure substantially the same as this, made in the Senate June 15, 1882, after careful consideration, I stated the number of our population who should be in schools as, in my opinion, 18,000,000. I believe it to be now 20,000,000. By the census of 1880 the number within the school ages was 15,303,535. Of this number were then enrolled, that is, their names were on some list of pupils, 9,780,773, leaving 5,522,762 not attending school anywhere. But there were 567,160 enrolled in private schools, making a total of 10,347,933 enrolled in all schools of the country, both public and private, and leaving 4,955,602, or nearly one-third, of the legal school population not attending either public or private places of instruction.

If, now, the total enrolled in public and private schools be increased one-eighth, as in previous calculations, we have a present school population in process of mental training of 11,641,424. If I am substantially correct in assuming a present population of 20,000,000 who should be either in public or private schools, from our total of at least 56,000,000 now living in this country, there will remain 8,358,576 who do not attend schools of any kind whatever, unless it may be of liberal or professional training. Making all allowances which can be reasonably claimed, there must be 8,000,000 of less than 21 years of age who are not enjoying school privileges of any description whatever. But look still further, in order that we may judge of the efficiency of our system in dealing with those actually enrolled. By the census, out of the 9,780,773 on the public school registers, there was an average daily attendance of 5,804,993; so that the real fact is that the net educational result is the same as though the latter number had attended the whole school period yearly, which is perhaps five months of the twelve in the whole country, and 9,499,542 had not received a single hour of school instruction for the year.

If the present average daily attendance in public and private schools be ascertained by adding one-eighth to the aggregate of 1880, to wit, 5,804,993, plus two-thirds the enrollment in private schools (which we may fairly assume to be the average daily attendance, or, to be liberal, 400,000 pupils), we have 6,204,993 increased by 775,623, or a total of 6,980,616, or say 7,000,000 in round numbers. Deducting this number from 20,000,000, and we have the same general result upon the educational status of our school population as though 13,000,000 of the 20,000,000 did not attend school at all.

Of course this calculation is of little value save as it affords a means of comparing our real condition with what it would be if the whole school population should attend constantly five months yearly between the ages of 4 and 21 years. Making every possible allowance for professional and other forms of special training, I do not believe that there is an average daily attendance of 10,000,000, or one-half our population, between the above-named ages twenty weeks of the year. I do not think there are sittings or accommodations of any kind, no matter how primitive and inexpensive, for one-half our school population. We have now less than 300,000 teachers and an average of more than 66 pupils for each. We require at least 200,000 more, and both the professional standard and the pecuniary compensation of the body as a whole should be very much raised.

In table 136, page 1640, part 2 of Compendium, the whole number of teachers employed at the time is set down at 236,019; the total number who attended school during the year 1880 at 9,946,160, and the average daily attendance 6,276,398. The whole number of public schools, elementary and high, is placed at 225,880; the number of school buildings 164,832, and the whole number of sittings provided 8,968,731. The data I have relied upon in making these calculations have been derived in part from the census and in part from the returns of the Bureau of Education, which are collected with great care.

I propose now to state a few well-authenticated facts in regard to the actual condition of common-school education in different portions of the country.

The Louisiana Educational Society has just memorialized Congress upon the subject of national aid to common schools, praying for an appropriation. Their petition, presented by Senator GIBSON, is printed at length in the RECORD of March 11, 1884. It is such an admirable though distressing statement of the situation that I will ask the Secretary to read it to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE LOUISIANA EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY,
New Orleans, March 4, 1884.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We beg leave to lay before you, on behalf of the State of Louisiana, the following statement of facts, and to submit this memorial:

The report of the superintendent of public education of the city of New Orleans for 1881 showed a total school population (6 to 18 years of age) of 61,456; a total enrollment in the public schools of the city of 24,401; and an average daily attendance in December and January (which were the months of largest attendance) of 17,135.

Although the number of educable children has largely increased since then, the superintendent reports for January, 1884, the enrollment to be only 14,482, with an average attendance of 11,070.

With an allowance of 10,000 in private and parochial schools (which is a large estimate), we still have 36,974 children in New Orleans receiving no educational instruction whatever.

The census of 1880 shows an average attendance of 15,190 (which included the months of most meager and the largest attendance). Thus you will see at a glance the large decrease in the number being educated, although the population is steadily increasing.

A corresponding retrogression exists throughout the State, and it may be safely affirmed that of the 273,845 school population of Louisiana (census of 1880) not more than 30 per cent. of them attend either public, private, or parochial schools.

In the fifteen Southern States, including the District of Columbia, the census of 1880 shows that there are 2,702,835 (white and black) of the 5,703,216 school population not enrolled in schools, and notwithstanding the efforts made by the people of these States and the generous contributions from private sources in the North for educational purposes the number of children unenrolled in the schools and the illiterates continue to increase.

The State and city have done much toward public education, but the illiterates are such a large proportion of the population, and poverty is so widespread, that the taxable property can not bear such a burden as must necessarily be imposed to provide for and sustain public schools.

We are aware that, in so far as ignorance is the source of pauperism, crime, and a want of thrift, the State is chiefly interested and the Federal Government indirectly only, but there is a common ground on which Federal and State interests meet and blend. Good government is necessary for both, and it is equally the duty of both to see that the citizen is made capable of performing the duties of citizenship intelligently, fearlessly, honestly. Said one: "Honest enough, brave enough, and keen enough to resist corruption, defy violence, and defeat fraud."

Both are alike interrested in making the masses of the people sufficiently intelligent to understand what constitutes the greatest good for the greatest number; and to comprehend also the converse of the proposition, that the good of the greatest number is the highest and best interest of the individual citizen.

We believe that the very life of the Republic and the preservation of the liberty it vouchsafes depend upon the intelligence of its people, the universal education of its citizens; that as their illiteracy increases so do the dangers to our country multiply.

In the words of Senator BLAIR: "Education, physical, intellectual, and moral, is the primal necessity." The fathers and founders of our Government so considered it. They thought that a republic could stand only on the intelligence and virtue of its citizens.

Our danger is imminent and increasing. France in 1870 realized that it was not the needle-gun but educated Germany which so quickly brought her to defeat and submission. She was taught a bitter lesson, by which she is now profiting. Since then she has largely increased her taxation for public schools, made elementary schooling free and attendance compulsory. Let her history teach us to educate our children, be they white or black.

But this can only be done with the liberal aid of the National Government, and unless it comes to our assistance the condition of our educational work must grow steadily worse.

We believe that a very large sum is necessary to meet the great need of the country. A bill before Congress proposes to give $15,000,000 for the first year and to decrease the appropriation $1,000,000 each year during a period of ten years, dividing it according to the number of illiterates in each State.

We trust that some such measures may meet your approval. Some such measures are necessary to stay and roll back the tide of illiteracy in this and other States of the South, which now finds no barriers strong enough to resist it. We believe it to be the duty of Congress to make some such appropriation, and on behalf of our State we ask it to do so.

Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, declared the necessity for and the importance of public education. Said the latter in his inaugural address of 1817: "Let us by all wise and constitutional measures promote intelligence among the people, as the best means of preserving liberties."

Presidents Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur have severally recommended it, and President Garfield said: "All the constitutional power of the nation and of the States should be summoned to meet the danger by the saving influence of universal education."

With our poverty upon us and dangers before us we appeal to Congress to do all that can constitutionally be done to aid in the education of youth, so that we may reap the fruits of industry, integrity, and intelligence.

Executive Committee Educational Society of Louisiana.

Mr. BLAIR. On Friday, March 24, 1882, a committee of the National Educational Association appeared before the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate and House of Representatives, to urge national aid to public-school education. The association comprises the superintendents of public instruction of the States and Territories and a large number of the principal educators of the country.

The committee of the association consisted of Hon. G. J. Orr, of Georgia; Hon. M. A. Newell, of Maryland; Hon. J. H. Smart, of Indiana; Hon. Hugh Thompson, of South Carolina; Dr. J. W. Dickinson, and Hon. B. G. Northrop, of Connecticut.

This committee presented at the hearing another memorial already prepared by representatives of the great religious denominations of the land, of the trustees of the Peabody fund, and of missionary and educational institutions, which memorial they indorsed and urged upon the consideration of Congress and the country.

I ask the Secretary to read the memorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

A MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

The undersigned earnestly call the attention of Senators and Representatives to the following facts and suggestions with reference to governmental aid to common schools on the basis of illiteracy.

The following table is based upon the estimates of the Bureau of Education. In the sums raised by the States interest on the invested funds is not included, except in a few States. The table is not exhaustive, but only illustrative. [See next page.]

We respectfully suggest:

1. The help should be so given that it will stimulate rather than supersede the necessity of State effort.

2. It should be help for the common schools; temporary aid in the training of teachers perhaps, but chiefly in giving them opportunity to teach. "The safety of the Republic is the supreme law of the land." This is the maxim which not only justifies but demands action on the part of the General Government, and it should also suggest the limitations under which the action should be taken.

3. The help should be immediate and not remote. The fortunes of war and the necessities of legislative action have made citizens of a large mass of ignorant men, whose votes are to shape, for weal or woe, the character of our laws. Education alone can convert this mass of ignorance and element of danger into one of enlightened strength and safety.

Largely more than one-half of a fund for the education of the illiterate would go to the South for negro illiteracy; less than one-fourth because of white illiteracy. If Congress should create a fund which would give $3 per annum per capita for the education of this class alone, it will require an aggregate annual sum of $18,719,958. Of this, Mississippi, e. g., would receive $1,119,603; but of this $959,529 would be for colored illiterates and $160,344 for white illiterates.

Representing an educational work in the South chiefly for the negro race, in which have been expended about $10,000,000, and speaking with a wide knowledge of facts, we emphatically assert the impossibility of accomplishing this great work unless the General Government shall come to the assistance of those States in which this illiteracy is chiefly found.

Every dollar we have expended expresses the conscientious and earnest desire of the donor that this work shall be done, and is an emphatic vote for the action for which we ask.

In the name of the millions of Christian citizens whom we represent we earnestly urge Congress to help qualify the ignorant voters who are intrusted largely by Congressional action with the ballot for the duties with which they are charged, believing the power to do this is co-ordinate with the power that enfranchised them.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March, 1882.

Mr. BLAIR. I call attention to these signatures, not only on account of the great personal worth of the men themselves, of the superior position which they occupy as individuals in the country, but on account of the representative capacity in which they have signed the memorial. These denominations are also organized into a national educational assembly, which has had two annual meetings, of which Bishop Simpson is the president. It is proper that I should observe here that there is a substantial combination of all the great religious bodies of the country, at least in the Northern States, who have one specific purpose, and that is to urge upon Congress the appropriation of national money in the direction of general education.

The hearing which followed is to be found reported in full in Miscellaneous Document 55 of this session, to which I refer the Senate, but from which I wish now to quote a few of the more important statements made on that occasion. Superintendent Orr, of Georgia, addressed the committees as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the duty assigned me on this occasion is a very simple one. I have been laboring in this work in my State for the last ten years.

I desire to say that Superintendent Orr can speak with larger and more reliable authority probably from the standpoint of an educated, energetic, and patriotic Southern man upon this subject than any other man whatever in the whole country. I consider his statements as of very special significance, and entitled not alone to the attention of the Senate but of the entire country; in fact, all that I shall read, much to the weariness, I trust not to the disgust, of any members of the Senate, will be from representative men, who are much better authority on this subject than anything I might state. Mr. Orr said:

I have been the representative of the Department of Education since 1872. I do not propose to detain the committee by any lengthened remarks. I propose to give you, gentlemen, some plain facts showing our condition, showing our necessities, showing the temper and spirit of our people, and I feel that when I do this, when I put before you the condition of the State of Georgia, I shall have given you a type of what prevails throughout the entire South.

In the year 1860, when one of the honored Senators from my State, now present, was our chief executive, the tax returns, according to the documents in the office of the comptroller-general, summed up $672,000,000. After I entered the office which I now have the honor of filling I went to the files of that office for the purpose of trying to ascertain the aggregate value of property at the first return made after the war. I found it to be $170,000,000. The property of the State was thus reduced $500,000,000 in value. This made a great change in the condition of the State, as you may well know; but this does not represent fully the change. It lacks a good deal of it.

I will put before you, gentlemen, a few other considerations which will show more fully the great change which was wrought. Everything that we had accumulated during the four years of the unhappy struggle in which we engaged was invested in confederate securities, and was held in the shape either of bonds or of confederate currency. Thus what remained of the labor of four years, after the devastation of your army and the support rendered ours, was blotted out in one hour. Hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands of the best men in the State of Georgia were thus left in a condition in which, under the old postal laws of the United States, when postage was paid at the place of delivery, they could not have taken a letter from the post-office. You will very readily understand, then, how we were situated as to our capacity to commence life again.

Not only this, but the whole labor system of the country was thrown into disorganization. The agriculturists had no means of going to work again, and we are an agricultural people, as you well know. They had no capital to begin with. They had to borrow. They had to give a lien upon the products of the soil in order to enable them to pay the debts, and those who held the capital exacted exorbitant interest. Our farmers and agriculturists have been paying from 50 to 100 per cent. for advances. Having their noses thus put to the grindstone, they have been kept there up to the present time, for every intelligent man knows very well that farming can not be conducted successfully when the capital used in it costs such a percentage. The lack of resources and the utterly disordered condition of the labor of the country put us in a very helpless condition.

Let me glance for a few moments at certain other facts. We had in the State of Georgia two kinds of citizens—those who had always been citizens, and a number of persons, very nearly equal, who had been made citizens as a result of the war. The last school enumeration, which was taken four years ago, showed that we had 198,000 colored school children in the State. The entire school population is 433,444. The difference will show you how many are colored; nearly half, you will see.

Let me say a few words about the colored people. They were made free without resources. They had no capital; they had no habits that would lead men when thrown upon their own resources to accumulate capital. They have been gathering capital gradually, until I am very glad to report that the last return of the property of the State showed that there were in the hands of the colored people of that State some $6,000,000 worth of property. I think the colored people of my State have done nobly; I say it here to their credit. But the point I am now making is the immense burden which was put upon us. I do not give you an idea of that burden by telling you the number of persons who were suddenly made free without resources. That does not give you an idea at all.

There is no means of getting at the number exactly, but I think at least one-half of the white population was in the same condition, utterly wrecked, ruined financially by the results of the unfortunate struggle in which we had engaged. For one, I want to see the last remains of that struggle forever buried so deep that the hand of resurrection will never bring them up again. I think it becomes us of this generation to begin to think about living for the future, to forget the past. We have a great country, and here we must dwell; our people want to dwell with you in unity and harmony. I know what I say; I have visited in the course of the administration of my office almost every county in the State of Georgia. I have made two hundred addresses to the people. I have stated to you the difficulties now. I know the condition; I know the spirit of the people, their present sentiment. I know it from mingling with them in their cottages and in their cabins, for I have visited the colored man as well as the white man. I have mingled with all; I know their feelings.

I want to say to you, gentlemen, that in the State of Georgia, under my administration of ten years, the entire loss of school fund will not foot up more than about $6,000. In an administration covering ten years there has not been a single dollar misapplied with that exception that I know of. We try to make it do the greatest possible amount of good. We try to manage it with the greatest economy. We admit to our schools all who want to enter them. We commenced in 1871 with a school attendance of 48,000. We have gone gradually upward. My brethren here will excuse me for using the same illustration which I did before the association when in session. One of the fathers, a man contributed to us by New England, one of our most honored men in the early history of that State—I allude to Abraham Baldwin—in speaking once of central power, illustrated it by that wonderful power known as the screw. He stated that at every revolution it gained a little and it held all it gained. I quote his illustration, not making the same application of it; I make a very different one.

We have gained at every revolution a little in Georgia, and we retain all that we gain. We are moving steadily forward. We commenced with an attendance of 48,000 the first year. The second year we had 83,000, the next year 136,000, the next 156,000. I shall not follow the statistics along. Year before last (my year's work has not been footed up, as the returns are not all in) we went up to a school attendance of 236,000. We have never failed to gain as much as 9,000 in any year. We have gone over that in attendance every year, and the colored people have proceeded pari passu with the whites in their attendance. They commenced with 6,000 and went up, according to the last return, to 86,000 colored children in our schools. There is no discrimination made; no man can afford to do it in an office in my State. So strong is the school sentiment in favor of the administration of exact and equal justice that no man can afford to do it. We are struggling to do the very best we can with our limited means.

I have read a good deal on the subject of the school history of this country and of the different States. In addition to that, I have been giving my attention to this great subject of the education of the races for eleven or twelve years. I have been reading whatever fell into my hands, and you will excuse me when I say that considering the circumstances in which we were placed, the great disadvantages under which we labored, the immense difficulties which we had to contend with—considering all these things and considering the work achieved, I do not believe the equal of it has been done in any State of this Union in any time during the past. If it has, it is not within my knowledge. We have wrought a marvelous work, but we are unable to do what ought to be done. We come to you and ask the interposition of the strong arm of the Government, the Government of your fathers and of our fathers, for we are one of the old thirteen. We stood shoulder to shoulder with you in that contest, and I want to say here to-day that if another contest shall arise our people will stand by the people of New England and the people of the Middle States in supporting the power and the authority of the Government of the United States.

Gentlemen, I do not know that I could state anything further that would be of service to you. I wish to add that I was greatly gratified when my brethren here from New England, and from the great Northwest, and from the Middle States, and from the Southern States, met in council, and when we sat down as brethren, and when we agreed almost unanimously upon every point to be submitted to this committee for consideration. We are practically a unit, and on all of these recommendations the men from all portions of the country agree.

Now, gentlemen, begging pardon for taking up so much of your valuable time, and thinking that it is proper for me to yield to others who may have something to say on this occasion, I shall conclude by asking, as I know I shall have, the candid consideration of this great question of the education of the masses, greater than questions of commerce, than questions of currency, than questions of tariff, than questions of constitutional law—greater than any questions that statesmanship will have to contend with and settle, because we make the people, and without the people we can have nothing else. We make the men and women of the country. I shall say nothing further.

Representative Updegraff, now dead, asked this question, to which Mr. Orr responded:

I would like to ask the honorable gentleman whether the average time of continuance at school has increased?

Mr. ORR. Our last Legislature succeeded in adding about $100,000 to the fund. We shall have this year very nearly $600,000 to operate with. We shall be able to run our schools in many of our counties absolutely free for four months of the present year—that is my estimate—and in all of them paying the entire expense for three months. We are adding just as rapidly as we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Chair believes is the bill to which, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the Senator from New Hampshire is now addressing himself. It is now before the Senate in its own right for consideration. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. Hon. Hugh Thompson, of South Carolina, was before the committee and made the following statement from his standpoint as a prominent citizen of that State, and as superintendent of public instruction, I think, at that time:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in presenting the view of South Carolina I shall ask to call the attention of the committee to three points:

First. That the State of South Carolina is now doing all in her power for public education.

Secondly. That it is impossible in her impoverished condition for her to furnish the means of education to the masses of the children; and Thirdly. That the aid we ask for, if granted at all, should be granted immediately.

I have brought here some figures from the school returns of South Carolina which I wish to read, and as I have no set speech to make to the committee, I shall be glad to answer any question that any member of the committee may wish to ask. An interruption will not interfere at all with the line that I shall take.

I call the attention of the committee, first to the fact that in 1877, when I took charge of the department of education in South Carolina, the first thing I did was to call for a statement from the different counties of the amount of past indebtedness, known as the school indebtedness. I was aware that it was large, but I was surprised to find when the returns came in that we had upon us a debt of $210,000 due against the school fund. This debt at that time of $210,000 was supposed to be the full limit, but upon subsequent investigation it turned out to be much larger. During the period from 1877 until the present time we have been attempting to pay off this debt. In some of the counties the debt has been entirely liquidated, and there are not more than one or two counties now remaining in which there is any considerable debt to be paid. But that debt has hampered us in every move we have made to strengthen and develop our public-school system. In addition to that we have a debt of $191,800, known as agricultural land scrip. There was not one cent of that money to be found in the treasury; the last dollar of it had been misappropriated. That fund, too, has been restored.

The committee will observe, therefore, that we have paid a debt of over $400,000, money that ought to have been used for elementary and higher education, and that we have thus been hampered in our attempts to make the school system as strong as it might otherwise have been.

The assessed value of the property of South Carolina to-day is nearly $138,000,000. We have three sources of revenue from which our school-tax is derived. First, it comes from a constitutional tax of 2 mills on the dollar upon all the taxable property of the State. The amendment to the constitution making this a part of the organic law of the State was adopted in January, 1877. Observe, gentlemen, that this is part of the organic law; it is not subject to changes by different Legislatures. We are glad to state that each year the income from this source grows larger and larger as the assessed value of property is raised.

The second source from which we derive an income is from the poll-tax. There are in the State of South Carolina, on the books, 140,000 polls, and the poll-tax there is $1 a head. We have never succeeded in collecting more than $114,000 from this source, owing to the fact that a large number of the voters of the State are entirely without property, and we can not enforce the collection of even the $1 per head.

The third source from which we derive our revenue is local taxation. This mode of raising taxes is becoming more and more in vogue each year. At each session of the Legislature we find different towns coming forward and asking permission to levy additional taxation.

The misuse of the public money during the first years of the school system, from 1868 to 1877, and especially the abuse of power under the local-tax laws, is one of the great obstacles that the school men of South Carolina have had to contend with, because we are constantly met with the charge that the thousands of dollars that were wrung from the people within the period named were misapplied, were stolen and misappropriated, and that this public-school system is only an engine of taxation, the money for which will not be carried into the channels for which it was intended. I believe, though, that this spirit is rapidly passing away. As I said the other night before the association of superintendents, I am convinced that if to-day the question of maintaining the public-school system of South Carolina were submitted to a vote of white citizens alone, by a very large majority they would be in favor of maintaining it and strengthening it and of developing it so far as may be in their power.

I should like to call the attention of the committee, in order to show what the State is doing in this respect, to a brief comparison of the taxes collected for the different purposes in South Carolina. The whole of the State tax, in round numbers, is $639,000. The proceeds of the county taxes are about $900,000, making a total of nearly $1,500,000. The proceeds of the school and poll taxes, according to the last returns of the comptroller-general, were $465,000. In other words, the school tax of South Carolina is about one-third of all the other taxes that are collected in the State. The assessed school tax was $465,000. Of course the actual amount collected was a little less than that, being about $425,000, because there were a good many delinquent taxes.

In addition to this the State now makes an appropriation of $24,000 for the University of South Carolina. That university has two branches, the old South Carolina College at Columbia, for the whites, and the Claflin College at Orangeburg, for the colored. The Claflin College is partly supported from benefactions by benevolent persons at the North; but these two institutions for the higher education of white and colored are maintained by the State at an annual cost of about $24,000. In both these institutions instruction is free; no charge whatever is made for tuition. In the Claflin school at Orangeburg we have a normal department for teachers, which is each year turning out successive bodies of skilled and trained teachers, who are doing estimable work for the colored. In addition to this the State has recently made provision for the re-establishment of its military academy, appropriating $15,000 this year for that purpose. In this military academy there will be supported now, as before the war, two cadets from each county, who pay nothing whatever. They are supported in full by the State, and they are required to teach two years in the public schools of the State after their graduation. There will be another class of young men in the institution known as pay cadets, who will pay moderate tuition for themselves, and will not be required to render any service. They will pay their way through the institution. Besides that we have the normal institute, supported by the State, this year an appropriation of $1,500 having been made for that purpose.

You will observe, therefore, gentlemen, that we are appropriating now about $465,000 for elementary education in South Carolina and a little over $40,000 for higher education, making a total of more than half a million dollars which South Carolina is devoting to this purpose, with an assessed valuation of property of but $138,000,000.

I should like to call the attention of the committee to another comparison. The whole expense of the State government of South Carolina for the last year, inclusive of interest on the public debt, was $238,575. The expenses for the maintenance of the charitable institutions, there being but two, an asylum for the insane, and one for the deaf and dumb, were $116,164. Therefore the expense of public schools and of charitable institutions was $581,164. For these purposes South Carolina appropriates two and a half times as much as she does for the whole expenses of her State government. For public schools alone she appropriates twice as much as she does for all the expenses of the State government. I mention these facts in support of the position which I take that the State is doing all she can for the maintenance of her public schools.

I now desire to call the attention of the committee to the second point I make, which is that the State of South Carolina is unable because of her impoverished condition to give proper instruction to all classes of her people. The scholastic population of the State—children between 10 and 16 years of age—as made by the returns of the county school commissioners in 1875 (I have been unable to get the returns of the census, which are more accurate, and I doubt not will show even larger figures than these) was, whites 85,678, colored 152,293, making a total of 237,971 children. The school attendance in South Carolina for the year 1880-'81 was, whites 61,339, colored 12,119, making a total of 73,458 at the public schools. The expenditure per capita of school population is $1.95, the expenditure per capita of school attendance $8.50. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that while these schools are free and open to all, and no distinction is made on account of race or color, according to these returns (which are inaccurate, because I believe they are below the truth), we have 100,000 children in the State of South Carolina whom we are unable to educate for the want of larger means. The number of public schools in the State last year was 3,057; the number of white teachers 2,026, the number of colored teachers 1,223, making the total number of teachers 3,249.

Taking the illiteracy of South Carolina shown by the return of the last census, which I had an opportunity of observing last night, the ratio of white illiterates to the whole population is 7.77 per cent.; the ratio of colored illiteracy to the whole population is 33.09. I maintain that as far as controlling the white illiteracy in the State is concerned, South Carolina is able, ready, and willing to control it; and that she is equally ready and willing to control the colored illiteracy, but that it is beyond her power to do so. It is from this class of our citizens, a class to whom I claim that the State government of South Carolina in all its departments has done full and ample justice, that the trouble comes. I believe I speak the sentiment of the majority of the people of the State when I say that we in South Carolina feel that the safety and prosperity of the State depend upon the education of that class of our citizens. I need not speak to you, gentlemen of the committee, of the limited opportunities that the colored people have had heretofore for education, but you know that the absolute need for it now is such that if the United States Government does not hold out a helping hand to us at this time we shall continue to send forth each year illiterate voters by thousands.

Bear in mind, gentlemen, that one generation of these people has grown up without the opportunities of education. This generation has got now the fathers and mothers of another generation coming along. It is a well-established fact, a principle recognized by all, that to appreciate education is a consequence of education itself. It is necessary, therefore, for the State and for the General Government to come to the front at this time, and to make South Carolina and other Southern States what I believe the people of those States desire that they shall be, thoroughly educated.

I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are now in the Southern States about 5,000,000 children ready and needing the opportunities or education. The expenditures of the Southern States under this head are about $7,000,000; but little more than a dollar a head. It would take at the lowest calculation $30,000,000 to furnish the opportunities of education to our children in the South. Gentlemen, I say, as one knowing the spirit of the people and knowing their limited resources, that we have not the means to furnish this education.

I do not propose to detain the committee with any argument as to the right of the General Government to furnish the means for which we ask. I desire to say for my State, and I am sure that I speak the sentiment of other States, that we do not come here as mendicants in this matter. We do not come here asking for charity. We have put our own shoulders to the wheel; we are using all the efforts in our power, and we simply ask of this great Government that it will come to our aid now in the time of our great necessity, because if this aid is withheld now, if it is not granted now, as I have shown, there are thousands of children whom we are unable to educate, and who need this assistance at this very moment, who will not be educated.

I was told this morning, since I entered this room, by a gentleman to whom I was introduced, that South Carolina always liked to be in the front. As of old, South Carolina wants to be in the front in the matter of public education. It is for that reason we have come here, because we have not the means, as I have stated, to furnish this education ourselves. I believe it is but a few moments ago when some gentlemen from this side were called before a committee of the House of Representatives of Congress with regard to the deepening of the harbor at Charleston and the improvement of that harbor. That great work is now going on under the charge of a distinguished engineer, a distinguished soldier, whose duty it was during the war to leave more imperishable marks upon the city of Charleston. He is there now in the quiet pursuits of peace, deepening that harbor, and giving to South Carolina an outlet for her trade and her commerce which she has so long needed; but, gentlemen, there is a need that South Carolina has not second even to the deepening of the harbor of her great metropolis. Great as are her resources, wonderful as her power is when fully developed, the true source of her strength and of her power is in the brains of her people. It is for that purpose we are here to ask the Government to give her the means of developing the brains of her people, and we do ask that we may have an opportunity of coming to the front and staying there, as one of the States of the Union, contributing our share to the civilization and the progress of this great country, and making South Carolina as one of the States of the Union, contribute her quota to make the people of this whole country once more free, prosperous, happy, and united.

I call the attention of the Senate to these particulars because they demonstrate that on the part of the State of South Carolina there is really being a very earnest and energetic effort made to educate the children of the State so far as can be done with the available revenues. I call special attention to the following statement made by Hon. J. H. Smart, then and for many years superintendent of public instruction of the State of Indiana, as that of one of the most distinguished educators of the country, and a Northern man whose associations have been such as to make him a conservative and reliable observer. I am proud to claim him as a son of New Hampshire.

ADDRESS OF J. H. SMART.

Mr. DICKINSON. I now present a gentleman eminent as an educator, a friend of education, who is here to represent the North. I refer to Hon. J. H. Smart, of Indiana, and I will say before he commences that Mr. Smart presided two years ago at the meeting of the National Teachers' Association which met at Atlanta, and he knows well the spirit of the people of that country.

Mr. SMART. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall detain you just long enough to state a fact and to express an opinion, a fact in reference to the need of the South, and an opinion in reference to their willingness to do what they can.

It has been my fortune to be able to make several visits to a number of the Southern States, and on one of these, taken last summer, I was driven from one of the popular summer resorts in the State of Georgia to the railway station, a distance of about 18 miles—a road frequently traveled, because this summer resort was largely visited by Southern people—by a negro who owned his own team, letting it to the hotel proprietors and his own services during the summer months. He informed me that he owned a little house and a small amount of land; that he rented fifty acres, and I found that he knew a good deal about the condition of things in his locality. I have talked with several hundred negroes in the South as occasion offered, and I want to tell you some of the answers this driver gave to some of my questions on this ride.

This man was thirty-two years of age, and he told me that he had tried to learn; that there was a school within a reasonable distance, and that he had attended that school; but he confessed that he had not been able to learn very much. He was a man of more than ordinary intelligence for one in his condition. I asked him if he knew the name of the President of the United States, and he said that he did not. I asked him if he knew the name of the governor of his State; he said that he did not. I asked him if he had voted for the President of the United States at the recent election; he said that he did vote. "Can you tell me for whom you voted?" "No, sir; I can not; I don't recollect." "Do you know anything about England?" "Yes, sir; I have heard something about England." "Is it in the United States?" "I do not know." "Is France in the United States?" "I can't tell you; I think it is." "Did you ever hear of Governor Colquitt?" "Oh, yes; I think I voted for him. Is he the man you spoke of a moment ago?" "No, he is not the President of the United States." "Did you ever hear of Garfield?" "Oh, yes; he was hurt, wasn't he; he was shot, wasn't he?" "Is not that the man you voted for?" "Yes," he thought it was.

Now, this man, unable to read his ballot, is not a subject whose duty it is to obey, the sum of whose political duties is found in the word obedience, but he is a sovereign, and the ballot is put into his hands. It has been put there by the national Congress. That man makes the law that governs me. Forty per cent., as I am informed by Dr. Orr, of the voting population of this State are illiterates, there being 80,000 of them.

I related this incident to a number of Southern superintendents a while ago, and I was told that it was a typical case, much to my astonishment, and that what I found here with this negro was to be found in thousands of cases in the other States. I believe that the State of Georgia is in danger, and not only the State of Georgia, but the State of Indiana, from this state of affairs—in more danger than if one hundred thousand men were to land on the coast of Georgia to-day fully armed and equipped for war, and that the State of Indiana will suffer from this condition of affairs.

Now, I want to express the opinion that the Southern people are willing to do all they can to cure this great evil and remove this great wrong, and, so far as I have observed, the work that has been done, under existing circumstances, has been a marvelous work. The Southern people have made a heroic effort, certainly in three or four States that I have visited, to do the best that could be done for these colored people. I want to say that throughout the length and breadth of the Southern States, without one exception, the colored people are given the same advantages that the white people are given. No distinction whatever is made; and, so far as I was able to find out, there is an almost unanimous, certainly an overwhelming, sentiment in favor of educating the colored children equally with the white children. And I believe, from what I saw, that we are able to trust the existing State organizations represented by these gentlemen; we are able to trust them with whatever means we can appropriate, and I speak after some investigation and after deliberation.

There is a pressing need, and these gentlemen have told you about it; there is no necessity for me to talk about it, but I want to express the feeling that I think exists in my own section of the country; that this appropriation ought to be made—not only for the protection of the people of the South, but for the protection of the people of the North; that while we do not need it for our own illiterates, for we ought to be able to take care of them ourselves, we need it because we suffer from an ignorant ballot, and we see danger in it, so that we join our brethren from the South in asking Congress to make an adequate and speedy appropriation in order that this great evil may be rooted out.

Mr. M. A. Newell, then superintendent of public instruction for the State of Maryland, a very able gentleman, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not here to-day to make any special plea in behalf of Maryland. We think that in a small way and in the course of time we shall be able to take care of our own people in the way of education. I am here to show that, so far as Maryland is concerned, we are in absolute accord with the gentlemen who have already addressed you. We look upon ignorance not as a local but as a national question, and we consider it as much or nearly as much of an evil to have ignorance in Florida or Georgia as it would be to have it in Maryland or Pennsylvania. Yet I think, Mr. Chairman, though you and the gentlemen of the committee have studied this question long and deeply, you are hardly aware even now of the immense mass of ignorance that is pressing upon us not only in the South but in the Middle States and in the North. I can hardly bring this more pointedly to your notice than by stating a few simple facts with regard to my own State.

I have been at the head of the educational department of Maryland for fourteen years successively, and therefore I know all that I am going to say of my personal knowledge. We spend every year a million and a half dollars for common school education. We keep our schools open in most of our counties ten months in the year, in none of them less than seven months and a half, and an average of nine months of every year. Our teachers are reasonably well paid; they are properly selected, and are doing their work as well as could be expected under the circumstances. All our surroundings are in favor of education. The people believe in it for themselves, and they believe in it for their neighbors. And yet, Mr. Chairman, after sixteen years of a uniform State system, well supported, tolerably well endowed, the last census reports 134,000 illiterates in the little State of Maryland.

Now, sir, the argument is, a fortiori, if, after sixteen years of hard and honest work, we have not been able to wash out this black stain of ignorance, what chance have our friends in South Carolina and in Georgia and in Florida to deal with theirs?

Mr. Chairman, I am old-fashioned enough to think still that the State ought to do nothing that the private individual can do as well, and I am willing to carry it further, and to say that the National Government should do nothing that the State Government can do as well; but all history and all experience prove to us that the individual is not able to educate his children; he has never done it in the history of the world; the State must come in and aid him in the work; and I think we have proved abundantly that in our Southern States, at all events, the State is not able to do the work of education. Therefore, I say it is the duty and the privilege of the National Government to come in and help the States to do that which they are willing but are not able to do.

The above statement from the efficient superintendent of Maryland demonstrates not only the necessities of his own and other States, but the further fact that even with the prolonged school year an immense outlay is required to increase the accommodations that the surplus school population now not reached at all may be brought in.

Hon. D. F. De Wolf, superintendent for Ohio, spoke thus for Ohio and the central Western States:

Mr. DE WOLF. Gentlemen, there is one point that I should like to speak of for the State of Ohio, and I think for the central and Western States. I have mingled with these people for forty years; was with them during the great struggle that resulted in the reconstruction, so called, of the Southern States. Those States were a party to the doctrines that were embodied in that reconstruction when they united in imposing on the Southern States a large body of voters. They took the responsibility of imposing upon that section of the country and upon the United States a large body of voters. I do not know but that they did wisely, and I do not know but that they think they did wisely, but they think they assumed very great responsibilities, and I think they are ready now to consider those responsibilities, and to take what action may be necessary to meet those responsibilities.

Rev. Dr. A. D. Mayo, of Massachusetts, who is as well informed upon this subject as any man living, next addressed the committee. Dr. Mayo is well known throughout the country. His views have been expressed on many occasions, and they are those probably of the largest and perhaps the most accurate observer in the Northern States upon this matter of the school condition of the people of the South.

Rev. Dr. MAYO. Gentlemen of the committee: I suppose my brethren have asked me to say a word to you because for the last two years I have spent my whole time during the school year in visiting the schools of twelve of the Southern States, from Virginia to Texas, inclusive. During this time I have had the most ample opportunities afforded me by the State authorities, by teachers, by citizens, by pupils, by people of every class to ascertain the condition of educational affairs in that portion of the country, and I feel that I am in a condition to form intelligent opinions in regard to the several matters that will come before you in this consultation. Of course time will not permit me to give the data or the reasons for conclusions which I may express to you, but ever since I began this work—and I would say that previous to that I had no personal knowledge of affairs in the South, and never went through the South until two years ago—several conclusions have forced themselves constantly upon my attention.

In the first place, I am fully prepared to indorse that emphatic declaration of Dr. Curry, who perhaps better than any Southern man understands the educational condition of the South, when he says that the illiteracy of the Southern States is absolutely appalling. By this I do not wish to say that the leading classes of the Southern States are an ignorant people. I find them there a very cultivated people; I find a people equal to any people in the world; I find as a class the white people of the South are fully up to the people of any State in the Union in natural capacity and force; but the condition of illiteracy which exists seems to me absolutely appalling. And one little point I wish to call your attention to here: Not only is this illiteracy confined to the colored people and the poor white people, but there is great danger, unless something can be done soon, that great numbers of the children of the better classes of white people in the South will be plunged into illiteracy.

No class in the South suffered so much from the effects of the war as the respectable leading class of white people in the South, and to-day there are hundreds of thousands of boys and girls growing up through all the Southern States, the sons and daughters of the leading people of those States, who, unless something can be done very soon, will be doomed to grow up in ignorance. Perhaps the most pitiful thing that can happen to any State is that it should lose what it has gained. While the blacks and the poorer whites are really better off in educational affairs than ever before, the children of the better classes of people are absolutely worse off than they ever were before.

Now, to meet this condition of illiteracy it seems to me utterly idle to speak of anything but a system of thorough elementary education afforded by the State. No church system of schools, no private system of schools can meet the exigency. There must be a system of elementary education, which includes the training of teachers, proper school-houses, and everything of this kind, in order to meet this great want.

Another matter has forced itself very constantly on my attention, which has been alluded to before, which is this: I am pretty well acquainted with the condition of education in our country and in other countries, and I have no hesitation in announcing to you, gentlemen, my conviction that never within ten years in the history of the world has an effort so great, so persistent, and so absolutely heroic been made by any people for the education of the children as by the leading class of the people in our Southern States.

Practically, within ten years every one of these Southern States has put on its statute-book a system of public schools; practically, within this time every district of country in the South has received something that can be called a school. This school public, as we may call it, consisting of State officials, of school officers, of superior teachers, of thoughtful people all over the South, is to my mind the most forcible, the most persistent, the most devoted school public now in any part of the world. There is no body of superior teachers doing so much work for so little pay and under such great disadvantages as in the South to-day. There is no minority of people working so hard to overcome this terrible calamity of illiteracy anywhere in the world to-day as in the South. I give this as the deliberate result of two years of observation in twelve States.

Once more, gentlemen, it seems to me that in building up this system of elementary education our Southern people have come almost to a halt. For the last ten years the school public has been working in every conceivable way to bring the attention of the people to this matter, and I believe to-day that the practicable limit of taxation is about reached. We may say ideally and abstractly that the Southern people can give more than they do for education; but practically, looking at them as we look at every people in the world, I believe that the limit is reached. And what is the condition in which we find things there to-day? Perhaps $10,000,000 is expended through these States of the South for elementary education, and there seems to be just about money enough to put on the ground a system of schools which, while it is an improvement to the negro and to the poor white man, is profoundly unsatisfactory and insufficient for the leading class of the white population of the South; in other words the introduction of the public-school system has broken down the old-fashioned system of education by which the white people obtained their help, and has introduced an inefficient system, so that a multitude of these people really have no good place to educate their children.

Let me illustrate the state of things: Here is a town or a district that has a thousand dollars, all told, for school purposes; with that thousand dollars that district can establish an insufficient school for three or four months in the year, with an inexperienced teacher, in an insufficient school-house; a school which is not satisfactory to the best people, which can not do the work that should be done. That is the course of things all over the Southern States, in cities, in country, towns, and in the country districts, and the crying want through all that country is that what these people now have shall be supplemented by enough to put a good school system at once on the ground.

We must remember, gentlemen, that nine men out of ten in the South never saw what we call a good public elementary school. The thing that is necessary is to put for one year, for two years, for three years, in every district through that country a school that will be a fair representative of a public school, that the people can see it; and once having seen it and enjoyed its benefits they never will give it up again. Now, it is utterly impossible for the average school authority to get the money to put such a school on the ground. Give to that man another $500, another $1,000, and at once, without wearing himself out with importunity, he can put on the ground the school that the people need; a school that, instead of being a school that satisfied nobody, is a school that satisfies everybody; and once having seen that school for one year, for two years, for five years, for ten years, that people will be stimulated to great exertions and will never give it up.

Let me illustrate this by one spectacle which I saw which will put you in full possession of this point. The little city of Goldsborough, N. C., has about four thousand people. Up to a year ago that city had no school in it which was satisfactory to any portion of the white inhabitants of the city; it had a poor public colored school under the county authorities.

Six months ago a few of the enterprising citizens of that city were able to put into operation a thorough white graded school. By the aid of the Peabody fund they were able to secure an expert for a teacher, so that school took all the children in the town. Four hundred children were put into a good school-house, graded and organized; over them was put an expert teacher, and at once it was shown to everybody in that town what could be done with a good graded school. I visited that town one day, and it was like going to a town that was under the effect of a religious revival; everybody was in a state of delightful excitement; everybody was asking me to see the school; people were coming from all parts of the country to see it, and just because the agent of the Peabody fund could come in with his thousand dollars and give to that school the expert which made it what it was. The battle was won, the thing was done, everybody was satisfied, and the whole region around about was being instructed and brought up to that work.

Such schools in county towns mean good schools in the country districts. What we ask of you, gentlemen, is to give to these school authorities everywhere through the South money enough to supplement what they are now doing; so instead of an insufficient school, as they have now, they can put on the ground at once a good school, which will satisfy the people, which will confirm them in their desire to sustain education, and which will give them a fair understanding of the benefits of the institution.

Now, gentlemen, just one word more and I am done. I fully concur from my observation in all that has been said on several points. First, the South needs this money at once. It is an urgent case. Are you aware, gentlemen, that the average school life, reckoned by months, of the average boy east of the Alleghanies is four years; the average school life of the Western boy, reckoned by months, is three years; the average school life of the white and colored school boy in the South is less than two years; the average school life of the average Southern boy is not one year?

This is the turnpike gate through which these children are streaming, and while you are debating and consulting on the feasibility of different methods, generation after generation, you may say, are streaming through.

What is to be done should be done at once to meet the great demand of the present.

In the next place, money enough ought to be given to do the work at once. If the roof of your house is on fire and you are obliged to put it out by carrying water in buckets it does no sort of good to have a ladder that reaches to the second-story window. You are just as badly off as if you had no ladder. What you want is a ladder that reaches to the roof, that will take you up where the danger is. The school system of the South to-day does not reach the full magnitude of the difficulty. Give enough at once to enable the school authorities to put a good school on the ground everywhere, and the difficulty is met.

One thing more, gentlemen. I am acquainted with the State superintendent of instruction, I believe, in every Southern State. I am acquainted with the State school board, I think, of every Southern State but two or three. I have studied with great care in the records of all those offices their methods of distribution of money. I believe there is no set of men in this country who are handling a moderate amount of money with greater economy, with greater fidelity than these gentlemen. It seems to me it would be a great mistake in distributing such funds as you give to put into each of these States a dual administration. If that should be done, I believe that at once $100,000 or $200,000 of money would be thrown away, virtually, for supervision. I believe if there is any set of men in this country that can be trusted to administer a fund of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 in thirteen or fourteen States with fidelity it is the school authorities of those States, and therefore it seems to me that this money should go directly to the children through the accustomed channels, of course being guarded by all proper safeguards in the central power.

Among the cities of the South, no city has done so much as the city of Charleston. I know all those cities. No city has done so much with so little help as the city of Charleston. We have to-day two representative men with us. We have the mayor of Charleston, who represents what has been done in that city. We have, in another citizen of Charleston, a young gentleman who is a fine representative of the kind of young school men that we must rely on to do this work through the country. If your time and patience will permit, it will give me great pleasure to introduce to you the mayor of Charleston, Mr. William A. Courtenay.

Mayor Courtenay spoke as follows:

Mr. COURTENAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, having in view the great pressure upon your time, I can best show my appreciation of the honor you have done my city by limiting what I have to say to a very brief statement of facts.

I will say that about twenty-five years ago we commenced in Charleston the system of public schools which was then being spread over the country. There were in 1860, four large, substantial brick school buildings of modern construction, calculated to seat comfortably eight hundred pupils each, which in the then condition of our affairs was ample for the children that were then being educated. One of these buildings was destroyed by the fire of 1861, so that when we resumed our school work in 1865 or 1866 we had three school buildings with an average capacity of eight hundred seats, and we took the Shaw Memorial School into our public-school system, which had been erected in 1865, making the same number of school-houses and about the same number of comfortable sittings. We have made an equal division of those school-houses—two are for white children and two are for colored children—and there in the Morris street school (which is the largest colored school we have) eighteen hundred children packed into accommodations intended for eight hundred.

That is our school situation to-day. We have been for five years levying a small tax, and a new school building will be completed this year which will somewhat relieve the pressure, but we need really two or three more commodious buildings for school purposes, which we shall build in time when we can raise the money.

Now, gentlemen, in addition to the tax which is common all over the State of South Carolina, a constitutional tax of two mills, Charleston has paid during these last fifteen years an additional tax of from one to one and a half mills for the purpose of giving accommodations such as we have to give in these very crowded school-houses to a portion of the children of the city. I need not tell you that what was intended to accommodate 3,000 children will not accommodate 6,000, and that although there are over 4,000 children crowded into the schools, there are children who can not get a place inside the school-house to stand or sit, and are, therefore, not being educated. We have a very large city debt, and we have a large amount of charities to distribute every year, orphan houses and hospitals; the expenses of the city government are very nearly as much as those of the State; we have reached the limit of taxation; and we look naturally to the United States Government to come to the assistance of the city, the State, the South, and the country generally in illiteracy, and make some provision by which this great trouble can be cured.

I made a rough calculation hastily this morning without the data to make it accurate; but I assert here that the city of Charleston has paid for education over and above the State taxation since the close of the war somewhere between four and five hundred thousand dollars, and we will continue to do the best we can under any circumstances. But in view of the great burdens which are pressing upon us in many ways, because of the want of improvements in our city, and our great charities, which take from fifty to seventy thousand dollars a year—nearly 10 per cent. of the whole income—we feel that we can with some confidence come here and express our opinion in common with all other sections of the country for material and important aid.

If the gentlemen of the committee will be kind enough, I should like my friend Mr. Bryan to occupy the remainder of my time.

Mr. Bryan is a young, cultivated, and highly intellectual man, and seemed to be the embodiment of the better time which is to be. His remarks profoundly impressed the committee. He was an eloquent, vigorous young man, I suppose a truly representative man of the rising life of the Southern portion of our country. No man ever made a stronger, more vigorous, and more pathetic appeal for aid or for assistance of any description than did this young gentleman of great ability from Charleston, S. C. Any Senator who will read that and vote against this bill is less of a Senator than I think.

Mr. ORR. Mr. J. P. Kennedy Bryan is a young gentleman who has been referred to, the son of the United States district judge for South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. We shall be happy to hear Mr. Bryan.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would hardly deem it in this presence, with so much gathered wisdom and experience, proper for me to be heard here, were it not that the subject-matter which the committee is now considering is one that appeals and has appealed to me for years, young as I am, and one that is, I think, the first in the mind and the heart of the youth of the South. The burden of this question, the shoulders upon whom it is to fall, are those of the youth of that Southern country, who now wish to control its destinies and who now, for weal or for woe, await the decision here at this Capitol.

After what has been said by my friend Dr. Mayo, after what has been said by gentlemen from Massachusetts and from Indiana, after what has been said with regard to the State at large by my firend Colonel Thompson, I need hardly speak; and I would not speak but that I think by giving you a pictorial image of the city of Charleston in facts and figures, that concrete thing, I can show you that even municipal aid added to State aid, with all the agencies of private education, in an old community and aid coming from the city that doubles the State aid, still we stand appalled before a tide that we can not meet nor control. It is only because the city of Charleston is a representative community of the South and expresses the conditions of all those States, and in a more favorable way than the country districts, that I will give you the facts and the figures relating to that community, because those facts and figures will bring home the question in its reality and show really what is our necessity and our danger.

That city is more favored because it has in it the seeds of a cultured society; it has in it men of mighty powers from the past, and those men are there, and they think, and they feel, and they see what is upon us. It has in it not only that, but men who have a sense of duty and men who have conscientiously risen to all the burdens of this occasion.

Why, gentlemen, in 1860 the city of Charleston had an educational plan greater than any Southern city. It had a system of public schools in which there were four thousand white children, besides large private schools, which fully met all the demands of that city. To-day it has that same educational plan, and in those schools are four thousand children, two thousand white and two thousand colored. There is an equal division of the school facilities. To do that, the city of Charleston has to add to what the State revenue is for schools just as much again. It pays this year $72,000 in a city of 50,000, in which there are 23,000 whites and 27,000 colored, the colored paying 3 per cent. of the tax. After we have raised the local tax, double what the State gives, we find that we only have four thousand children in the schools; that is, we only have in schools what we had in 1860 of whites. More can not enter the schools; they are packed.

Gentlemen, the tax of a citizen of the city of Charleston to-day is 3.5 per cent. on every dollar of real and personal property. The city debt of the city of Charleston requires the levy of ten mills. Repudiation we can not go to. There is 1 per cent. levied in that city for the debt of the municipality. Then there is the State debt. With these heavy burdens, by the census and by the report of the superintendent of schools of the city of Boston, we pay on a ratio one-third more than the city of Boston pays for its whole system of education, primary and classical. We pay to-day one-third more than the city of Boston does in the face of a debt of five millions upon the city of Charleston.

Gentlemen, when his honor the mayor came to the control of that city in the same spirit of zeal and in the same interest that he overlooked all the departments, we got at the facts and the figures, and he said it is the duty of the city, simply as a representative city of the South, and on behalf of all, to reveal to the country this terrible and appalling condition to say to them, here is a national calamity; it is common in its origin to the people of this country; it is equally common in its evils and in its effects. We thought, and the city of Charleston and all the men there think to-day, that the National Government alone can help us—not to do for us, but simply help us in that which we can not do. If the tax goes above 3.5 per cent. it is a dismemberment of society. We simply ask you to hold up our hands; we simply ask you to roll back that tide. Where it will sweep we know not, and I, in all deference, do not think that all the wisdom here can tell us where it will sweep. We ask you, do not let it overwhelm us and you. We thought and were led to believe that that Government which, under the power of the Constitution, has the right to provide for the public defense referring to the time of war (for surely that was in the mind of the framers of the instrument) would come to our assistance in this time of calamity.

We were led to believe that that Government which, when the crisis came from the Mississippi Valley under the most awful deluge of the last five decades, sent immediately and within a day aid to those people asking for bread. We were led to believe that that same Government, acting on the same principle, would send to a more hungry people, who, if unfed, the worse will be the disaster, that bread of national life which they ask. We were led to believe that that Government which, when pestilence struck this country, in one day raised the means and sent broadcast over the land succor where small-pox or yellow fever struck, would send some relief to a more awful pestilence that is working in the body-politic. We were led to believe that that Government which, in its beneficence, looking to the general welfare of the agricultural interests of this land, sends from this national center good seeds in order that the labor of the husbandman may prosper and that he may gather fruit and an abundant harvest—that that same Government, on that same principle of general welfare, would give us not only good seed but some good seed to plant in this waste.

Gentlemen, it is only because the city of Charleston furnishes you such an example, it is only because I think we feel it as an old community, and we know what this thing means and what is threatened all the time; it is only because it is a representative city in that regard of all our Southern communities that I have spoken.

I think, I feel, in fact I know, that it is in the mind and the heart of the assembled representatives here from this land to help. I am sure we have not come and told our simple story in vain. We look for aid, and we expect it, and we trust that from that seed of national aid shall come great and abundant harvests that will overflow here in good government, in peace and prosperity years and years to come.

Hon. B. G. Northrop, secretary of the board of education for Connecticut, so well known for his life-long and very important services in the cause of education, in placing certain valuable statements before the committee urged an immediate appropriation. I read his remarks because he is a New England man, and a representative man, as truly a representative of the opinions and feelings of educators in that portion of the country as any man can be.

Dr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I now present Hon. B. G. Northrop, secretary of the board of education of the State of Connecticut.

Mr. NORTHROP. I desire to lay on your table, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a paper containing extracts from the speech made at Atlanta by ex-Governor Brown on the eve of his election to the Senate, an extract from the speech of Robert C. Winthrop at the Yorktown celebration, and in full a speech of Rev. Dr. Curry, bearing all entirely on this subject. And while I am up may I say that this is not a new measure, but when friends of the measure have pressed it before members of Congress in former years the objection has been "You can not force schools on any community; schools must answer to local public sentiment, and that public sentiment does not exist." That was the former argument. Now I say in addition to the proofs presented by gentlemen from the South as to the interest, you have in that paper, I think, a most remarkable demonstration of the interest taken, by the fact that ex-Governor Brown should make such a speech on the eve of his election, and it is a more remarkable fact that on the basis of that speech advocating this measure, advocating free public schools for all classes, he should be elected to the Senate of the United States by so large a majority. It demonstrates the new era in the South. I think that if the plan of giving $15,000,000 for this object is carried out now it will be worth more than $20,000,000 will be twenty years hence. The case is urgent; the need is immediate.

* * * * * * *

I must say that this measure, I am confident, will suit the North as well as the South. I have in this paper I have handed you printed the sentiment expressed by the Connecticut State board of education most heartily, and also other expressions of Northern sentiment; and may I mention in the briefest form one other fact showing the great change that has occurred within the past year? This subject was advocated ably before our association at its meeting in New York, one year ago, by ex-Senator Patterson, now the superintendent of education in New Hampshire. He advocated then that the money should be distributed by a large number of Federal officers in all the States. That met but one dissent at that meeting a year ago; that is to say, a majority of this association seemed to favor his plan, but one objecting. At this meeting every member of the association has expressed his views in favor of the plan of distributing the money through existing local officers. We are a unit on that point.

The resolution of the Connecticut State board of education referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the necessity of education to the perpetuity of free institutions, and of the great and disproportionate burden which adequate provision for universal education would impose on some of the Southern States, this association expresses its conviction that it is the imperative duty of the National Government to extend to those States in which the burden and the danger of illiteracy are greatest such pecuniary aid as shall enable them to provide that all the children and youth within their borders shall receive at least an elementary education.

The State board of education has formally expressed "its hearty approval of the sentiments of the above resolution, and its earnest hope that the influence of Connecticut in the National Congress and elsewhere may be exerted in favor of the adoption of some equitable and efficient means for the accomplishment of the end proposed."

The following letter is in reply to one addressed to Colonel Rogers, superintendent of public schools of New Orleans, by myself, in which, mentioning the fact that Dr. Bicknell, one of the most able, active, and earnest advocates of national aid to public schools, had understood him to say that he should not know what to do with a large sum if he had it, and that it might be lost or stolen, I requested him to present his views in full for publication. I ask the Secretary to read his answer. He has given his life to this work in Louisiana.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, March 6, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 3d instant is just to hand, and I hasten to reply. My friend Colonel Bicknell has evidently mistaken my views in regard to national aid for education. Our conversation upon the subject was fragmentary and of a personal character. So far as I can recall the words used by me they had no reference to the main issue, but were incidental to a feature of the subject, designed to show the necessity for a cautious, well-regulated, systematic expenditure of a large sum of money in a large city where school attendance was voluntary, and where the object was to bring in the large class of children who are now beyond school influences. I certainly never intended to intimate, directly or indirectly, that if any part of this national aid was to be expended in Louisiana by our State and city authorities it would, by reason of such form of disbursement or indeed for any cause, "be wasted or stolen."

Officially I can only speak for New Orleans. In twenty-five years past connected with educational work in this city I can not be entirely ignorant of the condition of affairs in other parts of the State.

For several years I have had a growing conviction that if we are to give public education to all classes of our educable population we must have outside aid from some source. I believe that this is the opinion of the great majority of persons who are familiar with the situation. With those who are engaged in educational work I know of no difference of conclusion as to the necessity of aid. You are furnished with the statistics of illiteracy. It is not necessary to repeat them here. They are not mythical. Those who are engaged in the work of education know that illiteracy is a present factor, and that statistics simply reveal how much is done or not done, and how insufficient are the means at our command.

Our school population in New Orleans between 6 and 18 years of age was 61,456 by census of 1880. For the year closing December 31, 1881, the whole number of pupils enrolled in our public schools was 24,401; average daily attendance, 14,566; average roll, 17,027. Our school population has increased, while school attendance has diminished. For the current year our total enrollment will not exceed 17,000, and our average attendance will fall short of 13,000 pupils. Estimating the number of children in private and parochial schools in this city at 10,000, and the number over 12 years of age who are engaged in some industrial pursuit at 10,000—a large estimate—and there are about 36,000 children and young persons of educable years who are not in any school, of whom about 26,000 can not be accounted for as either attending school or industriously employed. We are confronted with the fact that instead of overtaking ignorance, as it exists among the young persons in our midst, we are losing ground, and that to an alarming extent, since not only do we not keep pace with the increase in our population, but our school attendance has steadily declined.

The chief cause of this decreased attendance arises from the insufficiency of our school revenue. For the proper care and instruction of an average roll of 17,000 children, including cost of supervision, instruction, buildings, supplies, &c., we need an annual expenditure of $270,000. This implies a session of nine or ten months, necessary in a city system, yearly salaries of employés, &c. Our entire revenue, from all sources, falls short of $220,000. A constant pressure of financial restriction and curtailment naturally tends to contract the usefulness of the schools. Last year, 1883, our session was reduced from ten to seven months, all teachers having been discharged from service and the schools closed during three important school months. For several years past, the teachers have not been paid for two or three months of the year, and have held our school system together by their unrequited labors during that period.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I challenge the history of the world to produce a fact more honorable to humanity than the noble self-devotion of this body of instructors of youth, or more disgraceful to a great people than the neglect of both State and nation which rendered their self-sacrifice necessary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Notwithstanding the fact that the city of New Orleans has entered upon a prosperous era, those who control its finances maintain that they are giving as much to education as can be spared from the general revenues. I do not propose to question the correctness of their statement or the wisdom of their policy. I only know that we do not get enough, and that those who make the appropriations say they can not give us more. I know also that it follows from this want of money that our schools are not doing all the work which they might otherwise do, and that more and more children are growing up in ignorance and idleness, with stronger inducements to immorality and vice.

We have between three thousand and four thousand colored children in our public schools. They share equally with the white children in the privileges of education. They are instructed by competent teachers, have good buildings, and their condition is as favorable to their progress as any other class of pupils. The city government has not been able, since the war, to increase the amount appropriated in former years to one race only, and as the colored people pay but a small part of the cost of education, it follows that the colored pupils in the schools are mainly instructed at the expense of the whites, and that the children of the whites have been put on short allowance to make provision for the other class.

I know of no feeling antagonistic to the education of the negro. On the contrary, there is a growing opinion, so far as I can judge, in favor of extending to that class of our people the fullest and fairest opportunities. The kindly spirit which characterizes the relation of the two races in this city and State extends to their respective schools. There are no contentions or animosities. Teachers of equal grade are sent sometimes to the schools for colored pupils, or, again, to the whites, and I know of no hardship to which the colored pupils are exposed, by means of insufficient funds, in which the whites do not equally share.

We certainly do need aid for public education in the city of New Orleans, and if we had the money we could make good use of it. I believe if its distribution was intrusted to our State and city authorities it would be wisely expended for the equal benefit of all classes and conditions of our school population.

The present system could be strengthened and enlarged. Additional schools could be opened in portions of the city where they are much needed. The city school board has had before it for some time past applications from remote sections of the city asking for school privileges where none exist for either white or black children. Nothing but the want of funds has prevented the board from complying with the requests. Even under our purely voluntary school attendance, I believe that several thousand pupils could be at once, within three months, added to our school attendance if means could be provided for their efficient support, and I think it would follow therefrom that the usefulness and influence of the schools would steadily increase, so that we would be able to reduce the bulk of illiteracy by permanent progress in the intelligence and virtue of all classes of society.

So far as the condition of public education in Louisiana, outside of New Orleans, is concerned, it seems to me of even greater importance that we should have outside assistance if we propose to make any advance in overtaking illiteracy. The total school population of the State is 273,845. From the last published report of State Superintendent E. H. Fay, the attendance in all the public schools of the State, including the parish and city of Orleans, in 1880, was: Whites, 31,642; colored, 22,670; total, 54,312, or less than 20 per cent. of the school population. Outside of New Orleans, in 57 parishes, there were 819 schools with 16,326 white children and 17,075 colored children. The average salary of teachers was $25.62 per month. Six parishes reported, "No schools for want of funds." Nineteen parish boards report a session of 3 months or less. The aggregate of all months reported from all the parishes was 144.

For 1881 there was an increase in the whites and a decrease in the number of colored pupils. The last Legislature, 1882 (we have biennial sessions), appropriated one mill on the dollar for public education. Upon an assessed valuation of the property of the State of $200,000,000, this would give, if all collected, $200,000. Under the State constitution and legislative enactments this school fund is charged with certain specific appropriations aggregating about $90,000, all of which must be paid before any sum can be given to free public schools. After these deductions and allowing for the non-collection of taxes, we estimate the amount allowed for free public education at about 31 cents per capita on school population. The amount is too small, and we are looking to the next session of the Legislature, May next, for a more liberal policy.

Nevertheless, we are not confident of any very great increase in our school appropriations. A constitutional amendment, to be voted by the people, may be necessary before there can be an efficient school system for the State. The power to impose a local tax for education must be conferred upon parish authorities. At best the relief must be partial. The relations of the capital and population of the two races are such that a system of public instruction which is intended to meet the wants of the entire educable population, and which shall be sustained by a revenue derived from the property of the State, is beyond all present possibilities. Such a tax could never be imposed with the consent of the people. It could not be collected, if authorized, without breaking down every industry, and virtually confiscating the property of every planter and merchant in the State. To give six months' instruction to 200,000 young persons in the primary branches of a common-school education would require 5,000 teachers and an expenditure of a million dollars.

The friends of education do not contemplate a scheme so impracticable. We know that time and patient effort are needed to build up any great enterprise. We think that it is possible to strengthen and enlarge our present system of public instruction, so that it may be put in the way of ultimately accomplishing the great objects which it contemplates.

What would national aid do for Louisiana?

It would enable parish school boards to open schools where there are none now for want of funds. It would prolong the session of schools which are now kept open for one, two, or three months only. It would draw large numbers of children from idleness and ignorance to the school buildings, and it would enable school boards and other authorities to employ trained, competent teachers, who should be paid reasonable salaries with a regularity and promptness which secures cheerful and skillful service.

In rural parishes the services of young persons over 12 years of age are useful to the planter during several months of the year. From four to six months may be devoted to systematic school work, and if this should be continued only four or five years the seeds of a better life would be planted, and important results would follow to the individual, to society, and to the country. In a well-conducted school there may be acquired, by the average child, white or colored, during the period named, ability to read and write; to understand and perform the ordinary examples of arithmetic as needed in common business transactions; to know something of the geography and history of the country; to acquire habits of order and industry; to distinguish between right and wrong in the duties of life, with such moral lessons as grow out of every well-regulated schoolroom.

When opportunities for securing these results are within the reach of all classes—the poorest and lowest, as well as of the children of the more favored classes—we may reasonably expect a useful, honorable, and an intelligent citizenship.

Without education, we have unskilled labor, a discontented class of society, thriftless, heedless, with brutal passions and degrading vices, ready, when roused by fanaticism or demagogism, to hurl against the peace of society or the best institutions of the country a compact and powerful voting minority which already holds the balance of power between the two great political parties of the country.

At no period in the history of Louisiana has there been manifested a greater interest in the subject of education than at the present time. This, I believe, is generally conceded by the legal public men of the State. The subject enters largely into the present political canvass. An educational society has been formed in New Orleans, which already has a large membership of leading merchants and representatives of all trades and professions. Branch organizations have been established throughout the State. The fundamental principle of the society is free public education to all classes of children without distinction of race. We hope, by means of aroused public sentiment, to secure for public schools their full share of the resources of the State, but I imagine that the most sanguine friend of public education can not hope to materially change the figures of illiteracy, now resting upon the good name and well-being of the State, without the use of more abundant means than can be now drawn from the government or the people of Louisiana in the present condition of public and private affairs.

Asking to be excused for the length of this communication, I remain, dear sir,

Yours, respectfully,

WILLIAM O. ROGERS,
Superintendent Public Schools New Orleans.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
United States Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. On Saturday, February 16, 1884, a joint session of the Senate and House committees having in charge the subject of national aid to schools was held in the room of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

Dr. Orr and a committee of the superintendents of public instruction of the States, Dr. Thomas W. Bicknell, president of the National Educational Association; Professor Painter, and others, composing a committee of the department of superintendence of the National Educational Association, were present, and addressed the committee for four hours.

The proceedings are published in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 55, Forty-eighth Congress.

I respectfully refer the Senate to these addresses voicing the universal sentiment of all parts of the country, and coming from some of our ablest, best-informed, unselfish, and patriotic men, whose express business it is to know whereof they speak, deploring this all-pervading national evil of popular ignorance, demonstrating the necessity of national aid, and beseeching, not to say demanding, as our first-duty, its bestowal as the only adequate source of relief. It is impossible to attempt even a synopsis here of what they said.

Permit me here to add the memorial of the American Social Science Association, than which the opinion of no body of men whatever is more entitled to respect by the American Congress or the American people.

AMERICAN SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION,
Boston, December 28, 1883.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The American Social Science Association, impressed with the danger involved in the existence of a large number of illiterate voters in the population of this country, as revealed in the last census, for the proper enlightenment of which class of voters many of the States are unable to make adequate provision, and believing that a Government resting on the suffrage of the majority of the people can not preserve itself from corrupt influence nor secure a high decree of civil freedom unless education is generally diffused among all classes of voters; and further believing it to be within the constitutional power of Congress to provide in this manner for the safety of the Republic, and that the enfranchisement of the freedmen imposes an especial obligation upon the Government to qualify them for a safe discharge of the new duties devolved upon them, would earnestly pray that your honorable body will take prompt and efficient measures to avert these dangers; that money raised from such sources as your honorable body may in its wisdom deem best shall be distributed, for a limited period, to the common schools of the States and Territories, on the basis of illiteracy, and in such manner as shall not supersede nor interfere with local efforts, but rather stimulate the same and render them more efficient; said moneys to be distributed under such guarantees as shall secure their application to the object herein named, with equal justice to all classes of citizens.

Prepared by order of the American Social Science Association by the council of the Association.

FRANCIS WAYLAND, President.

Attest:

F. B. SANBORN, Secretary.

These petitions are not gotten up in the way that petitions are gotten up for a new highway. They are signed by men whose signatures are meant to indicate responsibility.

Rev. Dr. Curry, the general agent of the trustees of the Peabody fund, whose services to the country in the discharge of a great trust have already fixed his rank high among its benefactors, has addressed a memorial to the Congress, which I take this means of placing more conspicuously before the Senate and the public. I am at a loss to comprehend the motives which can refuse the necessary assistance to educate the classes for whom Dr. Curry, in his representative and personal capacity, makes this argument and appeal. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, the general agent of the Peabody education fund, would respectfully represent:

That in March, 1880, the trustees of the Peabody education fund submitted a memorial to Congress on "the vital necessity of national aid for the education of the colored population of the Southern States, and especially of the great masses of colored children, who are growing up to be voters under the Constitution of the United States." They accompanied their memorial by a report which had been prepared by a committee of their body, consisting of Hon. Alexander H. H. Stuart, of Virginia, Chief-Justice Morrison R. Waite, of Ohio, and Hon. William M. Evarts, of New York. The attention of Congress is invited anew to that very able and conclusive paper. Since the presentation of that memorial the subject of national aid has assumed larger proportions in the public mind and in the public conscience.

The census of 1880 exposes a fearful amount of illiteracy in the United States. As might have been expected, for an obvious reason, that illiteracy exists largely, disproportionately, in the lately slaveholding States. In ante bellum days the negroes were not educated. Since the abolition of slavery—a fact which no sane man would undo—the South, although making patriotic and self-sacrificing efforts in that direction, has failed, as all familiar with her pecuniary condition could have foreseen, to provide universal education for her people. The history of our country, prolific in instances of exalted patriotism and ready adaptation to local and national exigencies, furnishes no exhibition of these virtues superior to the attempt of the Southern States to meet the unfamiliar and difficult, but cheerfully assumed, obligation of giving rudimentary instruction to all classes, irrespective "of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The history of public schools in those States is a chapter of peculiar interest in the general history of our institutions and civilization. The credit due to an impoverished people, bravely struggling to do their part in the new and strange environments, is shared by religious bodies and individual citizens of the North, who, comprehending the needs of the young, have generously and munificently contributed money to supply them with the means of education. Hard experience has demonstrated the inability of the Southern States, unaided, to sustain the heavy burden of universal education. If illiteracy is to be removed, or prevented in the future, the States must receive liberal and prompt aid from the General Government.

This aid should be rendered in co-operation with the school systems of the States. Those systems, varying in details, but generally copied from the systems which exist in the Northern States, are the outgrowth of the convictions of the people. Year by year they are being adapted to the wants and peculiarities of communities and States. Constitutions command free schools; statutes establish and provide for them; State and local officers administer; State revenues are increasingly supplemented by local taxation. No organized opposition to public schools can be found; political parties are zealous to declare their purpose to sustain and perfect; press associations approve and newspapers give their valuable support; Legislatures invite educators and advocates of free schools to address them; the people are willing and eager to be informed and to adopt improved methods of instruction and school management. With probably the most extensive acquaintance with school officers in the South possessed by any man in the Union, acquired by personal intercourse with them, I make bold to affirm that no departments of government have better qualified, more patriotic, more trustworthy, more enlightened administrators. What is needed for success in making education universal is not severe Federal supervision, subordination of State schools to central authority, but a well-guarded and adequate appropriation of public money.

Of the extent of the illiteracy your honorable bodies, having ready access to the latest census returns and to careful compilations of school statistics, need not to be informed. On the dangers of this illiteracy it would be superfluous to enlarge. The basis of our free governments is intelligence and integrity. Free government presupposes intelligent self-government. The mere possession of power by the people is no assurance or guarantee of good government. Civil government can dispense with arbitrary restraints and with physical power; can allow the possession and enjoyment of personal liberty just in so far as the citizens impose, voluntarily and intelligently, restraints upon themselves. Free governments, governments of the people and by the people, allowing and securing the largest measure of individual freedom, are compatible only with popular education. It is idle to hope for free government or republican institutions apart from free schools.

From the act of the Continental Congress on the 20th of May, 1785, for the disposition of the lands ceded by Virginia and the other States, to the present time the United States is committed to the principle that "popular education is the only safe and stable basis for popular liberty" and to the policy of using Government property in aid of public schools. What was a privilege and duty in the past has now become an imperative obligation. The general argument for Congressional intervention to remove or prevent illiteracy becomes stronger when applied to the negroes. As is stated in the report to which attention has been called, the production of the pen of an honored and venerable statesman of Virginia, they are an "exceptional class of our population," and as such have peculiar claims on the justice and bounty of the Federal Government.

Their ancestors did not come voluntarily to this country seeking to better their condition, as come the immigrants who by thousands are now flocking to our shores. They were brought forcibly as slaves and were held as such prior to the Revolution by the connivance and direct action of the mother country and under the authority of the laws of all the States. When the war for Independence closed slavery existed in all the Colonies. The Federal Constitution sanctioned the institution. In the exercise of its discretion the Federal Government emancipated the slaves, elevated them to the dignity of American citizens, and invested them with the right of suffrage. "Slavery is but half abolished, emancipation is but half completed, while millions of freemen with votes in their hands are left without education." The new citizens need to be made to comprehend the duties of citizenship, to be taught the nature and benefits of the political rights they enjoy. From manumission and enfranchisement there is on the part of the Government a resulting obligation to secure to those suddenly exalted to citizenship and suffrage that amount of education which is necessary to enable them to discharge intelligently the new duties devolved.

Inter arma leges silent is recognized in times of extreme peril as a legal maxim. When the national life is endangered the Constitution yields to a liberal interpretation. The latitude is not because of war, but because of the crisis which war sometimes creates. If the necessity be as great, the peril as imminent in time of peace as in time of war, then with equal reason may be invoked the principle, salus reipublicæ est suprema lex. That masses of ignornnt voters constitute a national peril, justifying a resort to the "extreme medicine of the Constitution," it would be an insult to your honorable bodies to argue.

The evils of ignorant voting can not be exaggerated. Four Presidents in succession, with increasing emphasis, have invited the attention of Congress to legislation on the subject. State Legislatures, educational conventions, religious assemblages, public press, and private citizens swell the demand for immediate and effective measures of relief.

It seems that each generation must pass through its own trials, as each person must be disciplined for his own improvement and growth. We reap the fruits of the sacrifices and achievements of our ancestors, but for ourselves we must endure trials and meet responsibilities. Our Republic is a holy trust. Much as our fathers did, none the less are we required to do. Free institutions are still an experiment. They are on trial before the world. No peril is greater, more insidious, more pervasive, arouses more the apprehension of the patriot, than the illiteracy of citizens. Fortunately the evil is remediable, and the remedy is in your hands.

Your petitioner earnestly invokes your intelligent and continuous attention to the dangers which come from so much illiteracy, and trusts that action, prompt and adequate to meet the emergency, will be had before your adjournment.

J. L. M. CURRY.

RICHMOND, VA., May 17, 1882.

Mr. BLAIR. I may add as a recent expression from Dr. Curry, the agent of the Peabody fund, what he says in a letter:

A letter before me from one of the best scholars and most active school men in the South says: "The argument is unanswerable. Here we stand face to face with the necessity. All over this State the taxes of the white people can not be made to suffice for the education of both white and colored; with the utmost good-will, the resources are deficient. Nothing but national aid can solve the problem, and without it there is great danger that the effort may be abandoned in despair."

That last sentence is unspeakably important. If this Congress adjourns without the aid, I shall almost surrender hope in reference to the future of our country. May God save our land.

The Union League Club of New York city comprises over sixteen hundred of the leading citizens of the United States, residing in all parts of the country. Probably no body of men, unless it were the several loyal sovereign States, did so much as the Union League Club of New York to preserve the Union in time of war, or since the war has done so much to make it worth again preserving by their wise and patriotic endeavors to reconstruct the Government upon principles which are indispensable to its prosperity. I therefore introduce the following from their memorial to Congress, presented to us by Senator MILLER:

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB, NEW YORK, February 10, 1882.

DEAR SIR: The following report was accepted and the appended resolution unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of the Union League Club, held on the 9th of February, 1882.

We request you to present them to Congress, as being the respectful petition of this club.

Very few subjects equal in importance that of elevating the illiterate voters in the United States to the condition required for the proper enjoyment and protection of universal suffrage.

It appears from the census of 1880 that of the total colored population over 47 per cent. are unable to write. Of the total white population nearly 7 per cent. are unable to write. These percentages are much higher in the South. Those unable to write in Alabama are, whites, nearly 17 per cent.; colored, over 53. In Georgia, whites, nearly 16 per cent.; colored, over 54. In North Carolina, whites, over 22 per cent.; colored, over 51. In New Mexico, whites, 49.5 per cent.; colored, 90.5. In many of the States the means for instruction are confessedly insufficient to cope with this great evil.

The want of education and of consequent ability to use the suffrage so as to protect the voter from fraud, violence, and misdirection, and our free institutions from peril, have caused the introduction into the Senate of the United States of a bill entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools."

The Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureau of Education, is charged with the administration of the act, aided by a commissioner in each State, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The commissioner thus appointed is to act in co-operation with the State authorities in which he is located. In Territories this commissioner is charged with the general supervision and control of public education.

All payments under the act are to be made by Treasury warrants directly to the person in each State or Territory who renders service, on vouchers to be approved by the local authorities, the commissioner, and the Secretary of the Interior.

It will be seen, therefore, that the amount payable in any State or Territory can neither be diverted nor squandered, but that careful provision is made for the application of it directly to the purposes of education. The bill is comprehensive as well as guarded, and is to continue only for the length of time supposed to be required for stimulating the most sluggish of the States into the requisite activity.

The condition of the Treasury, with a large annual surplus, tempting to useless schemes of extravagance, would seem to be a favorable time for the adoption of a measure to secure the enlightenment of the uneducated and the safety of our republican form of government.

The Constitution, in express terms, provides, section 4, article 4, that "The United States shall guarantee to each State in this Union a republican form of government." The powers necessary to carry out this guarantee are implied and are therefore complete. By the act of the National Government a large body of illiterate men have been suddenly raised from the condition of chattels into that of freemen and voters, without any preparation for the high duty which admission to the suffrage involves. The extraordinary measures resorted to in States where the danger from this source is most conspicuous, often leading to bloodshed and anarchy, would seem to impose on the General Government the immediate duty of seeing that the republican form thus threatened by the two evils of illiteracy and violence shall be preserved. The necessary and proper means for this consists in such a wide diffusion of the benefits and blessings of education as will secure the requisite intelligence and patriotism.

The committee of political reform recommend the adoption of the following resolution.

GEO. B. BUTLER, Chairman.
S. M. BLATCHFORD, Secretary.

Resolved, That the Union League Club heartily approves of the scope and object of the bill introduced into the Senate of the United States by the Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR, of the State of New Hampshire, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," and that the president and secretary of the club be directed to affix their names to this report and resolution as being the respectful petition of the club to the Congress of the United States in favor of the passage of the bill.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WM. M. EVARTS, President.
DAVID MILLIKEN, JR., Secretary.

To the Hon. WARNER MILLER.

I wish to say, as bearing upon the expression of popular feeling and opinion on this subject, that I have here a large number of data of memorials which themselves are so large that, if all printed, I suppose the world would not contain the books they would make, as was said on another occasion. It seems almost trifling with the time of the Senate to accumulate this mass of evidence of popular feeling to be inserted in the RECORD. It is here, and it is ready to be produced if anybody should ever conceive the thought that there is no expression of the general popular, and that the best popular, sentiment on this subject.

I have collected citations from high authorities, and historical illustrations, bearing upon the necessity of education, especially in a republic. They are from authors of other nations as well as our own. Many of them are of high literary merit. They are good reading. I will read a few of them. Before proceeding to do so, I wish to make one statement as bearing on the interests of education in our Southern States by reason of the liberation of the colored people. The historical example nearest our shores, that of the liberation of the blacks in the British West India colonies, might well be adduced, and should be instructive to us. There the British Government, more considerate, perhaps, than our own, gave pecuniary compensation to the extent of about $100,000,000, if I remember correctly, to the owners of the emancipated slaves. No provision, however, was made for the education and the elevation of the colored people. They have had freedom so far as it could exist under the British constitution, and they have had degeneracy and demoralization accompanying it. Without wasting time to depict the causes of the social condition and industrial condition of those people, I will state one fact which is significant of almost everything else that could be said, that such is the social degradation of that people that most social ties are disregarded, poverty is universal, and over 60 per cent. of the annual increase of the population is illegitimate. Let me quote from the American Cyclopædia, volume 15, page 17:

The government measure was brought forward April 23, 1833. It proposed an apprenticeship of twelve years for the slaves, and to pay out of their earnings to the masters the sum of £15,000,000. The friends of emancipation remonstrated against these features of the plan, and it was finally modified by a reduction of the term of apprenticeship to six years, and a provision to pay the masters £20,000,000 out of the national treasury. The bill passed the house of commons August 7, the house of lords August 20, and received the royal assent August 28, 1833. The day fixed for emancipation was August 1, 1834, and it was left optional with the local legislatures respectively to adopt or reject the system of apprenticeship. Antigua and Bermuda rejected, while the other islands adopted, the system. The apprenticeship system did not work well.

It ought to be known and is known that like causes produce like effects. It is well known to those who have taken pains to be informed by evidence coming to them, though they may never have been in the Southern States themselves, and I have some personal observation that has instructed me, so that I am convinced of the fact, that the general condition of the colored population in very much the larger geographic proportion of the South is growing worse rather than better. The colored population when disciplined by their former legal status were much more industriously inclined than the youthful colored population that is now growing up. The colored youths now are not so quiet and good-natured and easily managed and tractable a race of men as the Northern people are inclined to think. I believe that they are rapidly becoming demoralized, an idle, thriftless population, with a tendency to violence, and likely to become a source of as much danger to the United States as a population like this described in Jamaica can be. They increase much more rapidly from natural causes than does the white population.

By the last census it is shown that they increase 7 per cent. more rapidly than does the white population of the whole country from immigration and births combined. While increasing in numbers, in my belief they are not improving in condition. In twenty-five years from now this Southern colored population, unless something is done to restrain, improve, and elevate them, are quite likely to be a source of violence and of turmoil in this country. Those who think otherwise, I imagine, will find themselves profoundly mistaken, and it is well enough to be instructed by historical examples when they exist.

I can not take the time of the Senate a great length in reading the citations from eminent men which I have made; but I will read a few in regard to national education. Macaulay in his speech on education uses this language:

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

This, then, is my argument. It is the duty of government to protect our persons and property from danger. The gross ignorance of the common people is a principal cause of danger to our persons and property. Therefore it is the duty of the government to take care that the common people shall not be grossly ignorant.—Macaulay's Speech on Education.

The education of the people is not only a means, but the best means, of obtaining that which all allow to be a chief end of government.—Ibid.

Another great authority says:

When we see government measures, which are excellent in themselves, fall from the opposition of an ignorant people, we at first feel irritated against the senseless multitude; but when we come to reflect, when we observe that this opposition might have been easily foreseen, and that the government, in proud exercise of authority, has taken no steps to prepare the minds of the people, to dissipate their prejudices, to conciliate their confidence—our indignation is transferred from the ignorant and deceived people to its disdainful leaders.—Jeremy Bentham's Works, volume 1, page 568.

Let me give further citations:

Ignorance causes poverty.

By diminishing productive capacity, and therefore wealth.

Intelligence is a most powerful factor in industrial efficiency. The intelligent is more useful than the unintelligent laborer: (a) Because he requires a far shorter apprenticeship * * *. (b) Because he can do his work with little or no superintendence * * *. (c) Because he is less wasteful of materials * * *. (d) Because he readily learns to use machinery, however delicate or intricate.—Walker's Political Economy, pages 52, 53.

By hindering improvement.

In some parts of the country the ignorance of the people of almost everything beyond their huts and potatoes and pigs, their entire lack of practial sense and judgment, and of that energetic and progressive spirit which advancement in education is apt to bring, has hitherto been one of the greatest hindrances to the progress of the country. With this ignorance there has often been coupled superstition, and a tendency to indolence, increasing poverty, distress, and discontent.—The Irish Question, by King, pages 283, 284.

II. Ignorance causes poverty.

Illustration from Scotland and Ireland in 1800–'10:

I am persuaded that the extreme profligacy, improvidence, and misery which are so prevalent among the laboring classes in many countries are chiefly to be ascribed to the want of education. In proof of this we need only cast our eyes on the condition of the Irish, compared with that of the peasantry in Scotland. Among the former you behold nothing but beggary, wretchedness, and sloth; in Scotland, on the contrary, under the disadvantages of a worse climate and more unproductive soil, a degree of decency and comfort, the fruit of sobriety and industry, are conspicuous among the lower classes. And to what is this disparity in their situation to be ascribed, except to the influence of education? In Ireland the education of the poor is miserably neglected; very few of them can read, and they grow up in a total ignorance of what it most befits a rational creature to understand; while in Scotland the establishment of free schools in every parish, an essential branch of the ecclesiastical constitution of the country, brings the means of instruction within the reach of the poorest, who are there inured to decency, industry, and order.—Robert Hall's Works, I, 201, 202. (1810.)

II. Ignorance causes demoralization,

Illustration from Rome:

But we must look beyond the political institutions of Rome, and seek in her social condition the primary causes of the fall of the republic. * * * There was no union of the different classes of society in common interests and sympathies, nor any adequate gradation of classes to balance their relative forces. Without a middle class, industrious, orderly, progressive, and contented, society was broadly into the rich and the poor. And in the later days of the republic both were corrupted. The rich became more covetous and grasping. * * *

The poorer classes were no less demoralized as citizens and depositaries of political power. Pauperized by bounties of grain; corrupted by bribery; debased by barbarous and brutal entertainments; tainted with the vices of slavery; without regulated industry; disunited by the confusion of many nationalities; and unsettled by incessant wars and revolutions, they were wanting in all the elements of a sound democracy.—May's Democracy in Europe, I, pages 225, 226, 227.

Illustration from France:

The peasants, suffering from want and resenting the oppression of the feudal lords, rose in great numbers in different parts of France (in 1353); they burned many castles, murdered the owners, and committed the most frightful outrages upon women and children, * * * and in later times the like passions were to be revealed in excess no less monstrous and unnatural.—May's Democracy in Europe, II, pages 91, 92. See also, Taine's Ancient Régime, pages 374–380.

II. 4. Poverty causes demoralization.

Illustration from Rome.

The mind itself can scarcely comprehend the wide range of the mischief—how constant poverty and insult long endured, as the natural portion of a degraded caste, bear with them to the sufferers something yet worse than pain, whether of the body or the feelings; how they dull the understanding and poison the morals; how ignorance and ill-treatment combined are the parents of universal suspicion; how from oppression is produced habitual cowardice, breaking out when occasion offers into merciless cruelty; how slaves become naturally liars; how they, whose condition denies them all noble enjoyments, and to whom looking forward is only despair, plunge themselves, with a brute's recklessness, into the lowest sensual pleasures; how the domestic circle itself, the last sanctuary of human virtue, becomes at length corrupted, and in the place of natural affection and parental care, there is to be seen only selfishness and unkindness, and no other anxiety on the part of parents for their children than that they may, by fraud or by violence, prey in their turn upon that society which they have found their bitterest enemy. Evils like these long working in the heart of a nation render their own cure impossible; a revolution may execute judgment on one generation, and that perhaps the very one which was beginning to see and to repent of its inherited sins; but it can not restore life to the morally dead; and its ill success, as if in this line of evils no curse should be wanting, is pleaded by other oppressors as a defense of their own iniquity and a reason for perpetuating it forever.—Arnold's Rome, volume II, page 19.

Illustration from the No-Popery Riots of 1780:

I do not know that I could find in all history a stronger proof [than the No-Popery Riots of 1780] of the proposition that the ignorance of the common people makes the property, the limbs, the lives of all classes insecure. Without the shadow of a grievance, at the summons of a madman, a hundred thousand people rise in insurrection. During a whole week there is anarchy in the greatest and wealthiest of European cities, &c.

The cause was the ignorance of a population which had been suffered, in the neighborhood of palaces, theatres, temples, to grow up as rude and stupid as any tribe of tattooed cannibals in New Zealand—I might say as any drove of beasts in Smithfield market.—Macaulay's Speech on Education.

II c. A discouraged person is useless and may become desperate.

His industrial power is small.

A fifth reason for the higher efficiency of the laborers of one class or nation than of another is found in greater cheerfulness and hopefulness, growing out of higher self-respect and social ambition and a more direct and certain interest in the product of industry.—Walker's Political Economy, page 54.

Fear is far less potent than hope in evoking the energies of mind or body, while efforts made under the influence of the former passion are far more exhausting than those made under the influence of the latter.—Ibid.

Discouragement may result in desperation [French revolution].

The feeling of hatred [in the French peasant at the time of the revolution, 1791] was become too strong to be appeased, because here too it was mixed with intense suspicion, the result inevitably of suffering and ignorance, and nothing but the overthrow of those against whom it was directed could have satisfied it.—Arnold's Lectures on Modern History, page 390.

III. Ignorance causes immorality.

Because its opposite, knowledge, elevates.

But to return to the moral good which results from the acquisition of knowledge; it is chiefly this, that by multiplying the mental resources it has a tendency to exalt the character, and in some measure to correct and subdue the taste for gross sensuality.—Hall's Works, I, 200.

Results of ignorance.

Where education has been entirely neglected, or improperly managed, we see the worst passions ruling with uncontrolled and incessant sway. Good sense degenerates into craft, and anger rankles into malignity. Restraint, which is thought most salutary, comes too late, and the most judicious admonitions are urged in vain.—Dr. S. Parr.

III. Ignorance causes immorality.

Ignorance vs. Education in Switzerland.

Neither in Switzerland nor in other countries do we find ignorance and poverty united with high moral qualities. In some of the cantons, however, where education is diffused, and industry and commerce have become sources of wealth, the people are contented and happy.—Dean's History of Civilization, VI, 108, 109.

Injuries from ignorance.

The laboring class, for instance, will have no mobility [if uneducated], will be in the power of the employer, will have no hope of bettering its condition of life by change of place, will be given to low pleasures. Crime and ignorance go together, and the prospect for the children of such a class is dark indeed. For the industry, morals, loyalty, and quiet of this class, for the safety of all classes some kind of education is necessary.—Woolsey's Political Science, I, page 227.

III. 2. Immorality causes degeneration. National degeneration comes from loss of character.

But this political ruin [of the Roman Empire] was an effect of a moral ruin, not a first cause; and a nation that has lost its character must decay politically until some new condition of the world quickens it again into life.—Woolsey's Political Science, II, page 601.

Fruits of long-continued moral advance.

There are certain moral fruits so conspicuous in the history of civilization that no pessimist can dispute them. That the long, slow movements in society which have been tending with steady purpose and sure result to establish order and the reign of equal laws; to extinguish slavery; to break oppression of every form; to mitigate the barbarities of war, and to put restraints upon it; to diminish human suffering; to help the unfortunate, and to lift the debased; to cultivate the cosmopolitan sentiment and the spirit of co-operation among men—that the movements which bear this ripening fruitage are moral movements, it is impossible to deny.—J. N. Larned in Popular Science Monthly, XI, 549.

IV. Ignorance causes error in judgment and conduct.

By opening the people to evil influences.

Nothing in reality renders legitimate governments so insecure as extreme ignorance in the people. It is this which yields them an easy prey to seduction, makes them the victims of prejudices and false alarms, and so ferocious withal that their interference in a time of public commotion is more to be dreaded than the eruption of a volcano.—Robert Hall's Works, volume I, page 203.

By deceiving him as to his interest in his neighbor.

The less instructed a man is the more he is led to separate his interests from those of his fellows. The more enlightened he is the more distinctly will he perceive the union of his personal with the general interest.—Jeremy Bentham's Works of, volume I, page 537.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF BENEFITS FROM EDUCATION.

Athenian intelligence.

Mitford was right enough when he assumed that an English county meeting reached the very height of political ignorance, only he should not have thence leaped to a similar conclusion as to the assembled people of Athens. * * * We suspect that the average Athenian citizen was, in political intelligence, above the average English member of Parliament. It was this concentration of all power in an aggregate of which every citizen formed a port which is the distinguishing characteristic of true Greek democracy.—Freeman's Athenian Democracy, pages 146, 147.

The education of a lower class in Turkey.

In the vigorous age of the Ottoman Government the Turks were themselves excluded from all civil and military honors, and a servile class, an artificial people, was raised by the discipline of education to obey, to conquer, and to command—Gibbon's Rome, chapter LXV.

Scotland vs. Ireland.

We have two nations closely connected, inhabiting the same island, sprung from the same blood, speaking the same language, governed by the same sovereign and the same legislature, holding essentially the same religious faith, having the same allies and the same enemies. Of these two nations one was, a hundred and fifty years ago, as respects opulence and civilization, in the highest rank among European communities; the other in the lowest rank. The opulent and highly civilized nation leaves the education of the people to free competition. In the poor and half barbarous nation the education of the people is undertaken by the State. The result is that the first are last and the last first. The common people of Scotland—it is in vain to disguise the truth—have passed the common people of England. Free competition, tried with every advantage, has produced effects of which, as the Congregational Union tells us, we ought to be ashamed, and which must lower us in the opinion of every intelligent foreigner. State education, tried under every disadvantage, has produced an improvement to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in any age or country.—Macaulay's Speech on Education.

WASHINGTON'S VIEWS.

Some views of education entertained by Washington are indicated by provisions inserted in his last will; e. g., he provided that the slaves who had not attained their majority at the time when they were to receive their freedom in accordance with his direction should be taught to read and write and be brought up to some useful occupation. He bequeathed $4,000 for the education of orphans and the children of the poor in the academy at Alexandria. He gave property for the endowment of a university which should draw to it the youth of all sections, thus preventing their being sent abroad to their injury, and reconciling local prejudices and antagonisms through friendly associations.

What I have read from Robert Hall was written at the beginning of the present century in reference to a status then existing in Ireland; but it is proper to say that of late years the educational privileges of Ireland have been very greatly improved, as in fact they have been in every European country, until to-day the truth is that many of them are passing our own country in the vigilance and intensity of the effort which they are making to educate their own people. Indeed, there is great danger that they will pass us, and pass us before a great while, in the matter of industrial skill, because of the greater attention they are giving to the matter, perhaps growing out of the fact that they have recently discovered the great need of the education which they want, and are making correspondingly vigorous efforts to overcome the prevailing ignorance. They also find that American production paying higher wages is nevertheless competing with them in their own markets, and likely to do so more extensively hereafter in all the markets of the world, and unless their people become educated they will soon be without employment or that form of employment giving productions for exportation to the other and increasing markets of the world. In other words, the skilled labor of Europe, based upon general education, is coming more and more in competition with the skilled labor of America, and our superior intelligence will not much longer tell to our advantage in this direction.

I close my citations from the writings of eminent men and illustrations drawn from the history of the race by quotations from two remarkable addresses delivered before the National Education Assembly, held at Ocean Grove last August, from the 9th to the 12th, four days, inclusive.

Over sixty addresses were delivered on that occasion by American educators and some others interested in the subject. Thousands of people were in attendance, and all religious denominations nearly were represented.

Rev. J. C. Hartzell, D. D., who was the active organizer of the great work, has published the proceedings in a volume, which I hesitate not to say is of greater practical value than any other work upon the subject of education, and its cognate problems as they exist and require to be dealt with to-day than any, and I had almost said all, other sources of information accessible of which I have knowledge. The book is an encyclopedia in one volume, carefully indexed, and treats exhaustively of the following topics: Education and man's improvement; Illiteracy in the United States; National aid to common schools; The negro in America; Illiteracy, wealth, pauperism, and crimes; the American Indian problem; the American Mormon problem; Education in the South since the war; Christ in American education; Tables: Illiterate and educational status United States, 1880.

On that occasion, among the sixty, Hon. John Eaton, Commissioner of Education, delivered an address, which was full of meat, and of good meat, too. I wish to read a little from it, not his comments and philosophy, but statements of fact. I read from page 49:

But we must not pause here; we must look at the reverse side. New England to-day has but 1 college student, male and female, to every 167 families; whereas at the end of the first twenty-three years of New England history, or when there were 20,000 souls in the settlements, there was 1 university graduate to every 40 families. May we not say that hence came such wisdom in laying the foundation of those States? When will the educated classes anywhere attain the same relation to the whole body of the people?

But against this attendance upon the public schools there is the non-attendance of 5,754,759. Allowing that these odd hundred thousand are in private schools that are not reported, there remain 5,000,000 of children of school age untaught. To furnish these sittings in buildings, at the usual average of $20 per sitting, would cost a hundred millions in money; to furnish them teachers would require an increase of 30,000 to the teaching corps, and a single year's preparation of these teachers at the average rate in New York would cost $10,000,000.

The pay of these 30,000 additional teachers for one year of ten months, at the rate of $32 a month, which is about the average throughout the country, would amount to $9,600,000. Add to this the items for preparation and school-house sittings necessary for these non-attending school children, and you have the grand total required for the first year of $12,000,000.

There has been an attempt to raise a laugh at the proposition of the honorable Senator LOGAN to appropriate $60,000,000 in aid of education, but I give you here figures which can not be invalidated, showing that his proposition falls $60,000,000 short of the sum which would be required to furnish for a single year all our school children now without school sittings and teachers.

Referring to myself he says:

Mr. Senator BLAIR, in his examination of this point in his recent speech, considering that Texas has a school period of only six years, states that if the school life were properly lengthened in that and other States the number reported without school accommodations and without teachers would be increased by three millions.

In our cities we are accustomed to expect the best teachers, best school-houses, best methods, and best supervision; but laws making attendance obligatory are wanting in more than half of the States, and, on an average, two-fifths of the children are not enrolled in the schools. Here are forced upon us the terrible problems encountered in older civilizations and more dense populations.

* * * * * * * *

The fifteen States and the District of Columbia, where slavery prevailed, having a legal white school population of 3,899,961, had 2,215,674 enrolled in schools, and with a colored school population of 1,803,357 had 784,709 enrolled, and expended $12,475,044. This money, it should be remembered, is divided pro rata, without distinction of color, in all States excepting Kentucky and Delaware. In the former State the colored people have had for educational purposes the benefit only of the income of the tax upon their own property and polls and specified fines and forfeitures. By an act of the last Legislature, however, provision was made for submitting to the people the question of adding a two-mills tax upon property for educational purposes, uniting this and the amount from the previous provisions for education, and distributing the whole pro rata per capita. In Delaware, $2,500 are now appropriated for the colored schools. What has thus been accomplished in these States for education may be taken as a pledge of what they will do.

* * * * * * * *

To which great agency can you assign the additional burden of educating these illiterates? To the family? How many families of the most cultured and best conditioned are unable to educate their children as in former times or as they desire; and among those colored people the least supplied with schools, how widely is the family a minus quantity as a factor in promoting the improvement of the young? Shall we then look to the church for the light to overcome this darkness? How inadequate are the resources of the church in the South to supply sittings and preachers for the special function of declaring the gospel? How generally are they in debt? What appeals are they compelled to make to their friends in other quarters? Shall we turn, then, thirdly, to the States, already impoverished and loaded with taxes and embarrassed by questions of repudiation? In reply, let me invite attention to the fact that the taxable real and personal property reported for assessment in those States is given in round numbers as $3,379,000,000, while the real and personal property in New York and New Jersey alone is worth nearly an equal amount, or $3,292,000,000.

What would the people of these two States say to an additional assessment on their property sufficient to erect all the additional school-houses and supply all the teachers for the instruction of the millions of illiterates in the South? All are familiar with the sensitiveness in the several Northern States to the assessment of any additional tax for education or any other purpose, and there the total wealth as assessed is reported as $13,095,000,000, or nearly ten billions more than in the South.

It should be remembered, in addition to the short period in which schools are already taught in the South, that there are 2,702,835 children of age not enrolled for instruction. Take another comparison: Charleston, S. C., now levies a tax of three mills on a dollar; but to furnish the children of that State a fair approach to the instruction given those in Massachusetts would require a tax on the property of the State of nearly three cents on the dollar. This the friends of education in Massachusetts or any other State would hesitate to propose in their own case.

* * * * * * *

I must not pause to elaborate these points, but supposing (1) that the labor of an illiterate is increased in value 25 per cent. by teaching him to read and write, 50 per cent. by fairly educating him, and 75 per cent. by giving him a thorough training; and (2) that the average value of the labor of illiterates is the same as the average wages paid employés in manufactories, then the following computations give sound conclusions.

By the census of 1880, the number of persons of twenty-one years and upward in the Southern States who were unable to write was 2,984,387. If 75 per cent. of them should be taught to read and write, it would increase the value of the labor of 2,238,290 persons 25 per cent. The present value of their labor is, approximately, $248 a year each. The increase of value would be $62 a year per capita, a total of $138,773,980. If 15 per cent. of the illiterates should be fairly educated, it would increase the value of the labor of 447,658 persons 50 per cent., or from $248 to $372 a year each. The total of this annual increase would be $55,509,592. If the remaining 10 per cent. of illiterates should have the value of their labor increased 75 per cent. by being thoroughly trained, the industrial value of 298,439 persons would be raised from $248 to $434 a year each, a total of $55,509,654. By adding the three totals just given, it is seen that the increase which would come to the industrial value of illiterates in the Southern States would be, were they educated as indicated, $241,727,220 a year.

A regular computation may be made for the entire country. The average annual wages paid by manufacturers is $345. The number of persons 21 and over unable to write is 4,204,262. By teaching 75 per cent. of these to read and write, the labor of 3,153,272 individuals is increased in value from $345 to $431 a year, a total gain of $271,181,592 each year. The gain which would come from educating 15 per cent. (630,654) of the illiterates so that their labor would be increased 50 per cent. in value would be $108,787,815. The same amount would be gained by so training the remaining 10 per cent. of illiterates that their labor would be of 75 per cent. more value; and the total annual profit to the country by the conversion of illiterate into educated labor would be, according to the premises assumed as a basis of computation, $488,757,022 a year.

Need I go further to indicate that education is a most profitable investment for both labor and capital? * * *

Omitting any reference to the influence of illiteracy during minority, or any bearing of the illiteracy of the female adults, the late census shows us that there is a great army of 1,870,216 adult males or voters who can not write, an army nearly double that ever in the field during the late deplorable civil war. You will certainly excuse me from any delineation of the horrors of the devastation that might follow their united and concentrated efforts against the peace and order of society. * *

I simply call your attention to what may be the injurious effect of their silent action at the polls. The members of our respective political parties believe in the rightness of their principles and seek to make their appeal to the reason and consciences of the people; but the figures disclose the alarming fact that in eleven States these illiterate voters outnumbered the votes cast in the last Presidential election by either of the political parties. Thus, should they unite under any strong, impassioned, successful leader, they would have absolute control of legislation and offices in those States, and of the election of twenty-two members of the United States Senate.

I turn now to the address of Col. Dexter A. Hawkins, of New York city, who is a prominent lawyer and publicist, as undoubtedly members of the Senate are aware. His address was upon the relations of education to wealth and morality, pauperism and crime. I read only the most pertinent extracts, and would refer any one interested to the entire address.

In 1870 the Commissioner of Education at Washington sent out a series of carefully drawn, comprehensive, and searching questions to the great centers of labor in all parts of the United States. These centers were so selected as to represent every kind of labor, from the rudest and simplest up to the most skilled. The object of the questions was to determine the relative productiveness of literate and illiterate labor. I have tabulated, reduced, and generalized the answers so as to get at what seems to me to be the average result over the whole country. This investigation—one of the most interesting ever made—brought clearly to light the following facts:

1. That an average free common-school education, such as is provided in all the States where the free common school has become a permanent institution, adds 50 per cent. to the productive power of the laborer considered as a mere productive machine.

2. That the average academical education adds 100 per cent.

3. That the average collegiate or university education adds from 200 to 300 per cent. to his average annual productive capacity, to say nothing of the vast increase to his manliness—to his godlikeness.

By the census of 1880 we had in the United States 4,204,362 illiterate adults—white and colored.

I read his computation in order to show that independent and most intelligent observers and thinkers arrive at substantially the same conclusion:

Now, putting their labor at the minimum annual value of $100 each (which is far below the average even for farm labor, while the wages of manufacturing operatives, including 15 per cent. of women and children, as shown by the census of 1880, average in the whole country $345 each per year), and the annual loss to these persons from the lack of at least a common-school education would be $50 each. This, for the whole number of 4,240,362, is $210,000,000 per year—a sum twice as large as the entire annual expenditure for public education in the whole country. This sum—$210,000,000—is a clear annual loss, not only to these illiterates, but to the community, by reason of their illiteracy.

* * * * * * *

The late slave States complain of their inability to pay the expenses of free common schools, and they raised for public education in 1880 only $10,883,104. The amount of the annual loss in these same States, from their labor being illiterate, is at least $150,000,000. The extra productiveness of their laborers over what it is now would—had they been educated, as in Maine and New Hampshire—establish and support free common schools nine months in the year for every child of the school age within their borders, and leave a surplus sufficient to support a free academy in every county and a free college in every State.

A supposition of that kind is very well, but it must be remembered that an existing state of things, where it is the status of human beings, can not be changed but by long and expensive processes, and that to change the actual condition in these Southern States to the degree of literacy which exists in the ones referred to must necessarily be the work of ten or fifteen or twenty years.

A careful examination of the census of England, Scotland, Ireland, and of the several countries on the continent of Europe indicates that, other things being equal, pauperism is in the inverse ratio of the education of the mass of the people; that is, as education increases pauperism decreases, and as education decreases pauperism increases.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden they put into operation in 1854 a rigorous system of universal compulsory education in the elementary branches. The effect in seven years upon pauperism was to reduce it 25 per cent. It has been calculated by statisticians and students of social science that 96 per cent. of pauperism could be exterminated by universal compulsory education in the elementary branches of knowledge and industry.

* * * * * * *

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, three great central States, where self-support is not difficult, one in ten of the illiterates is a pauper, while of the rest of the population only one in three hundred is a pauper. In other words, in those three great central States a given number of children suffered to grow up in ignorance produce thirty times as many paupers as when given an average common-school education.

In 1870 a special investigation was made, in fifteen States, of the inmates, to the number of 7,396, of almshouses and infirmaries. Of these, 4,327, or nearly 59 per cent., could not read and write; while in those fifteen States the average percentage of illiterates was only 6 per cent of the whole population. From this 6 per cent. came that 59 per cent. of the paupers; or, to express it in another form, a given number of children in those fifteen States, suffered to grow up in ignorance, produced twenty-two times as many paupers as the same number of children would if given a fair common-school education.

Similar results may be obtained from the census of almost every country in Europe or America.

We may safely say, then, that it is a general law of modern civilization that an illiterate person is from twenty to thirty times as liable to become a pauper and a charge upon the public as is one with an average common-school education; and that the annual loss to the community, in the United States, in the productive power of the illiterates, and in the support of paupers made such by illiteracy, is nearly, if not quite, equal to the amount that would be required to establish and maintain a free common school the year round in every State in the Union, amply sufficient for the whole fifteen millions of the children of the school age in the United States.

The annual expense of maintaining paupers—96 per cent. of whom have become such through lack of proper training while young—is at least ten times as great as would have been the expense to the public of securing an education while young to each of these paupers sufficient to have enabled 96 per cent. of them to support themselves instead of being a charge upon the public.

Education leads naturally to industry, sobriety, and economy; hence it makes one conscious of the benefits resulting from these habits.

Statistics proclaim in no uncertain voice that education is the surest preventive of pauperism; and that the expense of providing and applying in season this perventive would not be one-tenth that now brought upon society by pauperism.

The first incentive to action is self-support—gaining a livelihood. This is the very basis of personal independence of individual character, respectability, and influence. The key to self-support is education. Money and labor, invested in education, are capital invested in such a manner that the principal is absolutely safe, and the income large, sure, and promptly paid. The States should see to it that a reasonable investment of this kind is made in and for every child as it grows up.

* * * * * * *

In France, in 1868, one-half of the inhabitants could not read nor write. From this half came 95 per cent. of the persons arrested for crime. From the other, the educated half, came only 5 per cent. In other words, a given number of children, suffered to grow up illiterate, produced nineteen times as many persons arrested for crime as the same number would if educated, at least to the extent of the elementary branches.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden, from 1854 to 1861—seven years—the government, by a rigorous system of universal compulsory elementary education, reduced the number of prisoners actually arrested 51 per cent., and the number of crimes committed 54 per cent.

In the six New England States, in 1870, 7 per cent. only of the inhabitants above ten years of age were unable to read and write; and yet this 7 per cent. produced 80 per cent of the criminals. Or, in other words, a given number of children in New England at that time suffered to grow up illiterate produced fifty-three times as many criminals as the same number would if educated to the extent of the curriculum of the public schools. This fact is a complete vindication of the moral effect of the New England system of public education, Cardinal Antonelli to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the State of New York, in 1880, the illiterates produced eight times their pro rata proportion of the criminals in that State; that is, a given number of children brought up illiterate on the average produced eight times as many criminals as the same children would have produced if educated to the extent of the curriculum of the public schools.

In the city of New York, in 1870, among the illiterates, one crime was committed for every 3 persons; while among the literates there was only one crime to every 27 persons. Or, in other words, the ignorant class in that city furnishes nine times the criminals they would if educated in the public schools.

In the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in 1870, the illiterates, according to their numbers, committed seven times as many crimes as the literate class.

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, taken together, the illiterates committed ten times as many crimes, according to their numbers, as the literate class.

Take the whole of the United States together, according to the census of 1870, the illiterates committed ten times their pro rata proportion of crimes.

In Pennsylvania, in the years 1879 and 1880, one-thirtieth of the population above ten years of age could neither read nor write, and this one-thirtieth committed one-sixth part of the crimes, or nearly six times its proper proportion. But if we class with the illiterates the criminals who could barely read and write, but who had no education beyond bare reading and writing, it will then appear that the one-thirtieth of the population of Pennsylvania that is illiterate commits one-third of the crime, or more than fourteen times its legitimate proportion.

A careful examination of the statistics of twenty States shows the following average results:

First. That one-sixth of all the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly illiterate.

Second. That one-third of the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly or substantially illiterate.

Third. That the proportion of criminals among the illiterate class is, on the average, ten times as great as it is among those who have been instructed in the elements of a common-school education or beyond.

Fourth. That the expense imposed upon society to protect itself against a few thousand criminals, most of whom were made such through the neglect of society to take care of their education when young, is one of the heaviest of the public burdens. In the city of New York it is 50 per cent. more than the whole cost of the public schools.

In that city the annual appropriation for police, criminal courts, reformatories, jails, and penitentiaries is over five millions of dollars; while that for the training of the 365,000 school children in the city is only $3,500,000.

The average attendance at the schools in 1880 was 138,329. The "compulsory school age"—that is, the age within which all children are required by law in the State of New York to attend school—is eight to fourteen years. The number of children of this age in the city of New York in June, 1880, was 144,474; while the average attendance on the public schools of children of all ages from five to twenty-one in that year in the city was only 133,096. As a logical consequence of this neglect of education the city jails and almshouses are crammed and taxes are high.

The city, in its meager provision for education, and its enormous taxation for criminals (to use an old but expressive adage) "saves at the spigot but loses at the bung."

What is true of the metropolis of the country is equally true of every city, town, village, and neighborhood.

These facts could be multiplied almost without limit.

The examination of the statistics of criminality and illiteracy in the census of any civilized state or country will give results substantially in harmony with the above.

Carlyle says that—

"If the devil were passing through my country, and he applied to me for instruction on any truth or fact of this universe, I should wish to give it to him. He is less a devil knowing that three and three are six than if he didn't know it; a light spark, though of the faintest, is in this fact; if he knew facts enough, continuous light would dawn on him; he would (to his amazement) understand what this universe is, on what principles it conducts itself, and would cease to be a devil."

I desire here to introduce a series of tables compiled from various sources, but chiefly from the census of 1880 and from returns gathered by the Bureau of Education. There are sometimes slight variations in the results obtained by different agencies, but their general accord is an indication of their reliability.

Several of the most important are taken from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives on the bill for aid of the Government for educational purposes. I refer to Mr. Willis's report, very lately published; a report without which no examination of the subject will have been exhaustive, and with which no one can consider his sources of information incomplete.

These tables contain the substance of all the statistical matter in possession of the Government necessary for the study of the subject. Upon several of them I have expended considerable labor personally, but to the wise, philosophical, and indefatigable efforts of the Bureaus of Education and of the Census the credit of this mathematical and statistical grouping chiefly belongs.

There is necessarily some repetition of matter in showing different combinations of elements as they relate to different topics and propositions, but it is believed that there are important features peculiar to each table, and that the present and future will find this statistical statement one of convenient reference and perhaps of profound study.

These tables are twenty-four in number, and in order to facilitate reference to them I give a résumé of the contents of each.

The Southern States, seventeen in number, including the District of Columbia, are usually classed together as a section of the country requiring special help. Of all but Maryland, Missouri, and the District of Columbia this is true. The following table exhibits their condition:

a In Delaware the colored public schools have been supported by the school tax collected from colored citizens only; recently, however, they have received an appropriation of $2,400 from the State; in Kentucky the school tax collected from colored citizens is the only State appropriation for the support of colored schools; in Maryland there is a biennial appropriation by the Legislature; in the District of Columbia one third of the school money is set apart for colored public schools, and in the other States mentioned above the school moneys are divided in proportion to the school population, without regard to race. b Several counties failed to make race distinctions. c Estimated. d In 1870. e For whites the school age is 6 to 20; for colored 6 to 16. f Census of 1870. g In 1877. h These numbers include some duplicates; the actual school population is 230,527.

Excluding the States of Maryland and Missouri and the District of Columbia, and the total yearly expenditure for both races is only $7,339,932, while in the whole country the annual expenditure is, from taxation $70,341,435, and from school funds $6,580,632, or a total of $76,922,067 (see tables 2 and 7), or one-tenth of the whole, while they contain one-fifth of the school population. The causes which have produced this state of things in the Southern States are far less important than the facts themselves as they now exist. To find a remedy and to apply it is the only duty which devolves upon us. Without universal education not only will the late war prove to be a failure, but the abolition of slavery be proved to be a tremendous disaster, if not a crime.

a Per cent. preceded by the minus sign indicates a decrease. b In Pennsylvania occupations are also valued for assessment. This valuation for 1880 was $68,659,580. c Virginia and West Virginia are taken together, as West Virginia belonged to Virginia in 1860. d Average for the United States.

In this connection it is proper to observe that in the States where slavery existed in 1860 the valuation then aggregated $2,289,029,642, of which $842,927,400 was in slaves, and proper allowance must be made for this fact in estimating present power to bear taxation. The negroes were then taxed; they were productive as property. Now they require to be educated; then education would have destroyed them as property. They are now doing little more as a totality than to support themselves. Their taxable property is thus far very slight.
